Grand Spectacular Military and Naval Production

Wonderful Battle Scenes—The Sinking of the Blockade-Running Vessel.

The Death Struggle Between the Soldiers on the Lighthouse.

A Powerful Dramatic Story of Love and War, Romance and Sensation

Hal Peters, a loyal Southern boy, loves Grace Carson, daughter of the lighthouse keeper. His rival, John Adams, is an officer at West Point. When the war breaks out Adams ostensibly resigns his commission and enters the Southern army, but is secretly a spy for the Union forces. The Confederates plan to land a cargo from a blockade runner, and Adams notifies the Union soldiers, who plant a cannon at the water's edge and sink the ship. Peters discovers Adams' treachery, and in a terrific hand-to-hand struggle Peters is hurled over the cliff, and is found and revived by the lighthouse keeper, who takes a shot at Adams and brings him down as he is escaping in a rowboat.

"Those Good Old Days"

April 7

A gorgeously costumed production, in which the King makes merry with the dancing girls. The court jester tells the Queen and she begins to keep an eye on him. One day the King gets "fresh" with the sweetheart of a country bumpkin, who chases him with a pistol, and his subjects relieve him of his uncomfortable position upon his agreeing to grant them concessions for which they have been vainly petitioning, upon their agreeing not to tell the Queen.

"A Game of Poker"

April 10

On a split reel. Schmidt practices holding out a royal flush, and enters a card game. The card sharpers pick his pocket of his flush, but in passing the cards under the table, Schmidt gets his hand back and cleans out the players.

Years later the girl meets the son of the thief, whose father has changed his name, and the young people fall in love. Political hot-beds and producing centers CANNOT work harmoniously toward a finished product of credit to either.

Disaffection spreads—producers, actors and even technical department heads slow up—lose enthusiasm—acquire a mild form of the fatal sleeping-sickness—a disease your box-office is quick to diagnose.

Santa Barbara, Cal., is 105 miles from the nearest political maelstrom. No contamination spreads through the smiling hills and palm-strewn beach of the mission city—a condition strongly marked by splendid stories, peerless photography and really superb acting.

3 CALIFORNIA-MADE PICTURES EACH WEEK!

"Cupid Throws a Brick"

(Release Monday, April 7)

A bully story in which the hero connects with a healthy brick, thrown by an envious suitor. Cupid considered the brick carefully—and passed judgment according to the evidence submitted.

"The Homestead Race"

(Release Thursday, April 10)

How a home was saved and an unworthy rascal brought to justice. Good photography, a pleasing story and choice California settings.

"Woman's Honor"

(Release Saturday, April 12)

A splendid Kerrigan story. How a priest brought about a union, saved a woman's honor, and, incidentally, proved himself a capable man as well as priest.

To Theatre Proprietors —

By application to your exchange you may obtain handsome one-sheets of those popular "Flying A" players, Jack Kerrigan, Pauline Bush and Jack Richardson.

A vessel of the type of the "Half Moon" was totally wrecked and destroyed by fire in open sea. All New York newspapers declared the scene and incident to be thrilling and spectacular. One of the members of the company was severely burned by the explosion—a big climax to a remarkable and elaborate production.

Part 1—The Lure of London
Part 2—The Kitchen and the Cat
Part 3—Fame and Fortune

The adaptation emphasizes all that is poetic, dainty and picturesque in the old English legend. The elaborate settings and spectacular scenes are authoritative in every detail. The charm of Dick's dreamy and mystic character permeates the production and holds the interest while the spectacular and sensational climax of the burning boat and struggling crew adds an element of genuine thrill. The dignity of the performance, combined with its original and artistic light effects, characterizes the work as one of the big achievements of the year.

ON "DEMAND"

IN the film business, the word "demand" is used twenty-five hours out of the twenty-four. It is a slave to the industry—abused, over-worked and under-fed. It is a universal command. It is the avowed and natural purpose of every manufacturer to "create a demand." Sometimes they succeed—in creating a demand for other film! In pleasing contrast (pleasing to ourselves and perhaps to you) it is not necessary for us to stimulate, but rather to satisfy the demand for our product. There has been a spontaneous and sincere demand for

SERVICE

Good, clean, strong, reliable film service

Briefly, that's General Film Service. "Exchanges may come and exchanges may go, but General Film Service runs on forever." The exhibitor who pins his faith to General Film Service derives much satisfaction from the thought that an organization many times as large as any other engaged in a similar enterprise stands behind the films he uses and takes a sincere interest in his individual requirements. And his satisfaction is all the greater when his patrons show by their steady patronage that the quality and variety of films in General Film Service are recognized and appreciated. Discriminating motion picture patrons never yet failed to confirm the good judgment of an exhibitor who contracted for GENERAL FILM SERVICE.

Multiple-reel features that will make good

FOR SATURDAY, APRIL 5, 1913

"A CHANGE OF ADMINISTRATION"

2 Reels, Produced by Selig

A timely feature based on the political patronage evil. It shows the danger of summarily discharging old, trustworthy and capable officials and displacing them with untried men who are advanced to high positions largely as a reward for political services rendered. The biggest of many big scenes is the Inaugural Ball.

FOR MONDAY, APRIL 7, 1913

"The QUEEN of SPADES"

2 Reels, Produced by Cines-Kleine

The wife of a notorious gambler finds herself at the head of a large gambling establishment. Although not to her liking, her profession provides the only means of supporting herself and her daughter. When the latter graduates from the boarding school she has been attending and learns the occupation that has been responsible for her education, there is a scene. The mother's supreme sacrifice brings happiness to the daughter.

FOR WEDNESDAY, APRIL 9, 1913

"THE TOLL OF FEAR"

2 Reels, Produced by Lubin

An unusual and one of the most remarkable films ever released. The story was written by Romaine Fielding, who plays the parts of the only two characters in it. Fear, the unseen, overcomes two strong men in the quiet of the desert, and both seek refuge from it in death. Your audiences will follow the action of this film with bated breath.

FOR FRIDAY, APRIL 11, 1913

"THE WEB"

2 Reels, Produced by Vitagraph

An adventuress traps a man and his younger brother, but both succeed in disentangling themselves from her web. In doing so, however, there are complications that involve a number of people, some unscrupulous and some otherwise. The understandable manner in which a rather involved plot is handled is a testimonial to the ability of Vitagraph producers.

Facts and Comments

ALDERMANIC statesmanship has put forth another effort to "regulate" motion pictures in the city of New York. It is proposed to create a local board of censorship consisting of representatives of various civic and religious bodies. This is a good exhibition of that ancient pastime known as "whipping the devil around the stump." It stands to reason that the Board of Aldermen has no legal authority to create such a board. If, as Mayor Gaynor clearly pointed out in his recent veto, the Aldermen have no authority whatever to establish censorship of any kind, this new ordinance is practically a still-born child. We doubt whether it will wax strong enough to need the Mayor's veto-club to put it out of misery.

It is said that there are two influences behind all this hostility to the motion picture, one is supposed to be the vaudeville and theatrical interests and the other influence is believed to be Canon Chase of Brooklyn. It is easy to understand the opposition of the vaudeville and theatrical interests, but the antagonism of the clergyman is beyond our powers of comprehension. Of course Canon Chase is entirely sincere and animated by the best and most creditable of motives. He is an ardent believer in the efficacy of legal censorship. Waiving for the sake of argument the question of the constitutionality of censorship we wish to point out to the Canon the fact, that voluntary and self-imposed censorship in response to public sentiment is a much better and safer way of dealing with bad pictures. Let us cite just one example. Time was when the depiction of crime and all its revolting details went almost unchallenged on the screen. To-day the detailed depiction of crime has almost ceased entirely. This was brought about not by legal censorship but through voluntary censorship responding to an insistent public sentiment. The filming of contemporaneous crime, not infrequent in the early history of the motion picture, is to-day extremely rare, though the industry has grown to more than ten times its original size. This shows that the good things have grown much faster than the bad ones. When it was proposed recently to film the life of a poor girl, who had become notorious in connection with a murder in Virginia, the decent elements in the community and every reputable producer rose up in arms and the scandal was quickly stopped. Whatever attempts have since been made to profit by the filming of current crime or scandal have been timid and furtive and more or less disguised. All of this plainly shows that the motion picture is thoroughly amenable to public sentiment and that official censorship of any kind is not needed, even if it were legally possible.

IN these days of competition for the patronage of the exhibitor there are exchanges and groups of exchanges, which forget that it always pays to play fair and to stand by the men who have stood by us. We have in mind the typical case of an exhibitor who patronized a certain group of exchanges at a time when those exchanges were putting forth pretty poor stuff. This exhibitor not only patronized this group at a critical time but he advertised the products of the group to his patrons and kept praising them in the newspapers of his city. Other exhibitors in the same city had declined the service of this same group. Now when the group had become stronger and began to turn out better work it calmly made a deal with a competing exhibitor, giving him a service one day in advance of the old customer. This was done without any notice to the latter. He could do nothing under the circumstances but engage a newer service and is now living in fears lest his competitor go to first runs.

There is, it seems to us, no honor or profit in such transactions. No one will blame the exchange for getting all the business it can out of any given territory, but the rights and feelings of old friends and patrons should be respected, though it may result in the apparent temporary loss of a five or even a ten dollar bill. This habit of getting exhibitors to bid against each other is in the end unprofitable, every old experienced exchange man knows that much. Where the supply of film from any particular group of exchanges is limited the group should be satisfied with one good exhibitor in every smaller city. It is better to keep him for good than to have a horde of solicitors descend upon the town and create confusion and ill-feeling.

This leads us to say a word about the abuses of the "locked reel system." Nothing is quite so fatal to the liberty of choice, which is the exhibitors first right. Arbitrary selections, made not for the benefit of the individual exhibitor, but simply for the convenience of the exchange, ought not to be tolerated. In Europe, despite all efforts to introduce a monopoly in the exchange business, the exhibitor still occupies the controlling position in the industry. It is impossible to go fully into the situation at this moment, but all enlightened and progressive exhibitors agree to-day that the system of distribution now in vogue in this country is far from satisfactory and must be radically changed sooner or later.

WE are glad to observe that the overproduction of so-called "Westerns" is no longer a just cause for complaint. This sort of entertainment is shrinking to its proper and natural proportions. Even the exhibitor who personally admires this kind of thing and loved to see the cowboy chase the Indian is forced to the conclusion that there has been a surfeit and that the public have had enough of it.

Importation of Films.

Treasury Department Issues New Regulations.

The Treasury Department has issued new rules governing the importation of motion pictures under the copyright law of March 4th, 1909. These rules materially modify the instructions laid down for the guidance of collectors and other officers of the customs in a circular dated July 17th, 1911. A pirated copy of a film is defined as follows: "A film, which constitutes either an actual copy or a substantial reproduction of a legally copyrighted film produced and imported in violation of the rights of the copyright proprietor. Collectors will admit imported films concerning which some party in interest alleges an adverse copyright or where the adverse claim amounts to nothing more than an allegation of infringement of copyright. In such cases the claimants are relegated to the courts. Entry to imported films will be refused if (a) representations are made that they are piratical copies and such representations are not denied by the importers, or (b) if the collector is satisfied they do, in fact, constitute piratical copies as above defined."

Collectors will detain films covered by the preceding regulation and report the facts to the department for instructions.

If the collector is not satisfied that an imported film is a piratical copy, and the importer files an affidavit denying that it is in fact such a piratical copy, and alleging that the detention of the film will result in a material depreciation of its value or loss or damage to him, the film will be admitted to entry, unless a written demand for its exclusion is filed by the copyright proprietor or other party in interest, setting forth that the imported film is a piratical copy of a film legally copyrighted in the United States, and unless there is also filed with the collector a good and sufficient bond conditioned to hold the importer or owner of such film harmless from any loss or damage resulting from its detention in the event that the same is held by the department not to be prohibited from importation under section 30.

Customs.

Upon the filing of such demand and bond the collector will cause the film to be detained, and will fix a time at which the parties in interest may submit evidence to substantiate their respective claims, which evidence shall be reduced to writing at the expense of the parties in interest and transmitted by the collector to the department, with such report and recommendation as he may deem proper.

No film will be presumed to be prohibited from entry as a piratical copy under said act, and the burden of proof that any film is in fact a piratical copy will be upon the party making such claim.

If the film is held by the department to be a piratical copy, its seizure and forfeiture will be directed in accordance with section 32 of the copyright act, and the bond will be returned to the copyright proprietor, but if not so held, the collector will be directed to release the film and transmit the bond to the importer.

R. C. BACH A GOTHAM VISITOR.

In our midst for several days past has been Mr. R. C. Bach, managing director of the Dominion Feature Film Company, which has offices in Toronto and Montreal, Canada. The headquarters of the company is in Montreal. There will soon be opened other branches of this firm, in Winnipeg, Vancouver and St. John, N. B. On this trip to New York, Mr. Bach has purchased the exclusive Canadian rights for the Great Northern films and for the production of "The Life of Dante," as well as some others.

Pictures in Cincinnati Music Halls

Arthur Smallwood Plans Big Project for the Queen City's Mammoth Palace of Amusements.

If the plans of Arthur Smallwood are successful, Cincinnati will have a picture show par excellence. This energetic young man, whose home is in Cincinnati, but who has been engaged in the advertising business in New York for the past few years, has secured a lease of the big Music Hall on Elm Street in that city and will put on a strong picture program beginning March 29.

Music Hall is one of the largest auditoriums in the country, seating several thousand people, and is used for grand opera and other big musical entertainments. The picture entertainment will be conducted by the Empire Exhibition Company, which was promoted by Mr. Smallwood and is under his management. Several large Cincinnati capitalists are interested, so there will be no lack of funds to finance the enterprise.

The picture program will consist of eight reels of the best pictures including features and single reels. This will be varied by vocal and instrumental solos by the best of talent, and a fourteen piece orchestra will play the pictures.

A feature of the program will be the frequent appearance of popular photoplayers. For the opening week Mr. Francis X. Bushman, a former Essanay star, has been secured. For the week of April 7 Mr. John Bunny, the popular comedy man of the Vitagraph Company, will be the feature, and during the following week Miss Florence Turner, the first of the motion picture stars and a Vitagraph player, will appear. Others are being negotiated for.

Mr. Smallwood has had some experience as a picture theater manager and is planning many little comforts for his patrons. He will have a chaperone for young children and a playroom with nurses for the babies. There will be lady ushers and a maid in the ladies' retiring room.

The scale of prices for the house will be ten, fifteen and twenty-five cents.

To popularize the venture Mr. Smallwood proposes to bill it like a circus. For the opening nine thousand sheets of paper will be posted on the billboards all over the city. Elaborate heralds and other forms of advertising, including liberal newspaper space, will be used. Special advertising will be used for the feature pictures and the photoplayers.

Mr. Smallwood has been in New York for the past week getting ideas and features for his show. He announces the "Prisoner of Zenda" for the opening.

STREYCKMANS—MUSSELMAN.

H. J. Streyckmans, of the Mutual Film Corporation, was married on Friday, March 21st, to Miss Della Musselman, of Stamford, Conn. The bride is eighteen years of age and has just completed her studies. She was on her way to visit a sister in Chicago when Streyckmans interrupted her trip.

A. Kessel, Jr., president of the New York Motion Picture Co., was best man, and Miss Mae Kenny, assistant secretary, was bridesmaid. Kessel placed his big automobile at the disposal of the young couple for the day.

A wedding supper was served at Wallick's, at which fourteen guests were present. The orchestra played the wedding march throughout the evening, and bags of rice and many old shoes were thrown at the couple when they left.

PATHE CAMERAMEN CARRY CREDENTIALS.

Pathe Freres wish to call attention to the fact that Pathe's Weekly cameramen are equipped with proper credentials to establish their identity. Several instances have come to the attention of Pathe Freres whereby independent photographers, by representing themselves as Pathe Weekly cameramen, have secured moving picture rights that properly belonged to Pathe's Weekly. Pathe Freres wishes all persons interested to insist upon proper proof from cameramen before trusting in their statement that they represent Pathe's Weekly.

POLLACK SEEING EUROPE.

S. W. Pollack has sold his Lyric theater at Natick, Mass., to F. H. Wottan of Waltham, Mass., and is now enjoying an extended tour abroad. Mr. Pollack went from here to Naples and was in Rome for Easter. After visiting various other points of interest in Europe, he will return about May 5.

THE KAISER IN THE FILMS.

The special motion pictures of the German Kaiser, recently imported by the True Feature Company, were shown for two days at the Theater Unique on East Fourteenth street and drew big crowds. For bookings apply to True Feature Company, Box 219 Madison Square Sta., New York City.

Censoring Motion Pictures

An Interview With John Collier, General Secretary of the National Board of Censorship.

By H. C. Judson.

THE first question put to Mr. John Collier, general secretary of the National Board of Censors, was: What arguments can you give me to show that the work of the Censor Board is adequate? He seemed plainly ready for the question and glad to answer. He is still a young man and, as he outlined what the board is doing and what its real place is in the present and in the possible future of the motion picture business, we felt that, at least, the board was in the hands of a wide-awake man who knew when his feet were on the ground and knew what is practicable in a world of things as they are from what might be practicable in a world that was different.

Mr. Collier said in the first place that the board was truly national; for while its committees that sit before the pictures are of necessity drawn from people living in New York City, it is in weekly correspondence with over a hundred other cities whose Mayors, or Police Departments, or Boards of Licenses, or Civic Committees, receive every week a complete record of the board's action. This record includes a list of all the pictures seen, an account of all scenes or pictures censored, and general comments. The number of municipalities that are thus kept in close touch with it is steadily growing. In return for this record many of these authorities write to the board criticising it, so that the general secretary and his associates are continually kept informed as to what is thought of certain pictures or scenes all over the country. In this way its standards and criterions are being gradually modified to fit the wider field.

It is also true that while the members of the censoring committees are taken from one locality, that locality happens to be cosmopolitan New York and, in fact, many parts of the country are represented on them. It is, of course, true that certain purely local peculiarities cannot be taken into account; could not be under any conditions. For instance, it could hardly consider the feeling against Asiatics that obtains on the Pacific Coast, nor the sensitiveness in the South on the race question. It has to concern itself solely with the things that offend universal public morals. It does not visualize the "average spectator" as shop girl or as young clerk, or as child of any given age or as miner or farmer or as any other special type; but as American citizen, rich, poor, wise, simple, broad and narrow.

MR. JOHN COLLIER,
General Secretary of the National Board of Censorship.

That there is some discontent with and criticism of the work of the board, Mr. Collier admits; but insists that the same criticism would apply to local censorship; for no matter where any film was censored, no committee would be able to satisfy every one in that community. He also insists that what criticism there is, is neither general nor really significant. Much of it is very flimsy. He was, himself, recently asked why the board let so many bad pictures pass and demanded names of any bad pictures. The critic, he found, had not seen any pictures at all, and it is probable that the man behind the critic had not either. The real dissatisfaction among both spectators and exhibitors is with the artistic rather than with the moral quality of the programs. The board cannot decide questions of taste. He says that the offerings are not so good as they ought to be and that the producers are not keeping up with the times. He believes that this is due to the condition of the market that keeps the studios at such a high pitch that both producers and scenario writers are sadly overworked. He says, too, that until we have graded theaters, or theaters where pictures made and censored especially for children are shown, there is bound to be continual dissatisfaction.

"Do you think graded theaters for children would pay?" we asked, interrupting him. He replied that under present conditions they probably would not; but thinks that they could be made to pay in certain communities and referred to it as a compromise measure. For without it, reaction that will result in loss can confidently be expected. If we caught his meaning rightly, he looks forward to a time when the manufacturers will be more ready to consult with exhibitors as to what the people want.

When asked what he thought of State censorship, he expressed firmly his opinion that it would be undesirable. It, he sees, might give a chance to inimical interests, like the vaudeville business, for instance, to do malicious harm to the motion picture people. And it would put into politics what is now in the hands of the people directly; for The People's Institute, behind the National Board of Censors, has no interest in the continuance of its work except as a representative of the people. The board has no power whatever, except through public opinion. It was started, not by the manufacturers of pictures, but by the exhibitors of New York City who, in the beginning, paid part of the money needed to carry on the executive and mechanical work. It was later that the manufacturing companies of both licensed and independent groups agreed to share the expense together and the board became national in its scope.

In the board, as a whole, there are four committees: 1st, An advisory committee of fifty-five members, among whom are such men as Andrew Carnegie, Lyman Abbott, Samuel Gompers, Felix Adler, Anson Phelps Stokes, Joseph Silverman and others. 2nd, A general or controlling committee made up of the representatives of eleven civic organizations in New York City, such as the Charity Organization Society, the City Vigilance League, the International Committee of the Y. M. C. A. and the National Committee of the Y. W. C. A. In this committee there are also eight members at large. 3rd, An executive committee consisting of Frederick C. Howe, chairman; Ralph Folks, Dr. J. P. Warbasse and Matthew P. Adams. And finally, the Committee on Censoring that acts under the executive direction of the staff—John Collier, general secretary; W. D. McGuire, executive secretary, and Sara Lavine, educational secretary. This censoring committee is made up of a large number of men and women, all of whom serve without pay, and its members alone have the right to vote as to whether any picture seen is fit to be shown or not.

After any picture has been seen, a vote of the members present is taken and, if there is any doubt of its fitness, its qualities are discussed freely. Perhaps the majority will persuade the few who do not like the offering that it is not a picture that can properly be censored and, in that case, it is passed. Every member of this committee has the right of appeal to the general committee before whom the picture is then shown again, and the protest either sustained or turned down. The manufacturer likewise has the right of appeal. It may be that the board feels the need of pointing out to the manufacturer in question that his picture ran very close to what might be objectionably coarse; if so, this is done. In any case, a record of the picture is kept by name and the comment on it is embodied in the weekly report which, as we have mentioned, is distributed to all civic organizations that care to avail themselves of it.

The members of this committee are chosen carefully. Names are accepted provisionally and the possibly new members invited to attend, without the right to vote, during three meetings. They are then taken on for a month and at the end of the time made full-fledged members or dropped, as some are unfitted for this peculiar work.

Finally, Mr. Collier pointed out that the board's stamp of approval, "Passed by the National Board of Censors," is not fixed and can easily be transferred, at any time in the projection booth of any theater, from a legitimately passed picture to the worst offering that was ever thrown upon the screen. The Board's correspondence with other municipalities might show that this had been done; but could do so only in localities where the weekly report was read and the pictures closely followed. And he observed that there is no place in the world where any trespass on the public's right of decency can be so quickly brought to book as in America, where there are many laws, both State and local, that cover such a misdemeanor.

Problems of Local Censoring.

At present, not the entire public is against the exhibitor, but two groups—grafters and fanatics. So, if obnoxious laws are passed or if an exhibitor is unjustly treated in any locality, the fault is in no small degree with the exhibitors themselves. Due to the peculiar ease with which laws can be initiated, any member of the community who, for any reason whatever, honest or otherwise, wants legislative action, he has a chance of getting it. Mr. X., who may be either a grafter or a fanatic, offers a positive measure which he claims will protect the public and, even if the measure is not only unjust to the exhibitor, but quite valueless to the public, it may become a law. The legislature at the capitol doesn't know whether the measure is needed or not; but it has been told positively that it is needed and all that the exhibitors have been able so far to advance against it, is a negative counter assertion that it is not what its sponsors claim.

The legislators and the public, for the time being, are with the positive side and assume that the exhibitors' assertions are selfish. The public doesn't know what is really needed or what is just and the legislature is not well informed either. The only ones who are well informed are the exhibitors themselves and they seem to be making the grave mistake of remaining on the negative side, leaving the people to assume that they are in the wrong.

Let the exhibitors, then, recognize that there really exists a need of just and practical regulation and supervision; for until they do, Mr. Collier points out, the public is going to assume that they are in the wrong and they are laying themselves open to freak laws and, what is still worse, an unjust administration of laws. On the other hand, when they have reached this point and have agreed upon a minimum program and offered it to the legislatures of every state, they will then find that the public is with them. They can get their problems treated in a scientific, wholesome way and this will be the most economical way, looked at from the most selfish angle possible. What is truly needed by the patrons is what is truly needed by the exhibitor.

Such a program could plan for the regulation of all the purely physical elements in the picture show business, such as lighting, ventilation, exits, aisle space, etc. It could also demand that the licensing authority should be clearly marked out and have full power to see that all the regulations are properly enforced. It could demand that no license should be granted or denied or revoked without a hearing. Whatever this minimum program asked, it would have to be a scientific, honest attempt to cover the problem and its passage demanded of every legislature throughout the country. This would give the exhibitor the same chance of getting the right laws passed that the fanatic and the grafter now have of getting the freak or the unjust, unneeded law through.

That such a program need not take into consideration the quality of the picture product should be plain in these days, when it is becoming more and more clear that the quality is wholly in the hands of the exhibitors themselves. In the market conditions that are bound to come, and shortly, they can take what offering they find good and let the poor, inferior product go to the wall where it belongs. The one thing that is needed, Mr. Collier thinks, is a positive minimum program formulated by the exhibitors as an organization and demanded of every legislature in the United States.

The English Kineto Company will shortly release an exceptionally ingenious trick film entitled, "Animated Putty," dealing with automatic evolutions of a lump of glazier's putty which molds itself into every grotesque shape known to the plastic artist.

ANOTHER ORDINANCE PROPOSED FOR NEW YORK.

George A. Morrison, alderman from Brooklyn, who has been in close touch with Canon Chase, the Episcopal clergyman active in framing measures for the governing of moving pictures in the City of New York, handed up for consideration a brand new ordinance for the control of films to be exhibited within the five boroughs of Greater New York at the last meeting of the City Fathers. The main structural features of the proposed new ordinance is based on the lines of the Folks measure, which is still hanging in the air, but at the end Morrison advocates the appointing of a moving picture commission which would practically take the place, if passed, of the National Board of Censorship as far as Greater New York is concerned.

Alderman Morrison's ordinance proposes that the motion picture commission should be composed of the president of the Art Commission; city superintendent of schools; the presidents of the Women's Municipal League, New York Federation of Churches, Society for the Prevention of Crime; supervisor of Roman Catholic charities; Jewish Community and various other philanthropic and sociological organizations and that six men and six women be appointed from other organizations by the mayor of New York. This commission is to serve without pay, but suitable offices are to be provided by the municipal authorities and the expenses of the commission within suitable limits are to be defrayed by the city.

Paragraph sixth of the proposed ordinance reads: "The commission shall secure an effective moral inspection of motion picture films before they are granted permits to be shown in licensed places of amusements in New York City, but nothing in this ordinance shall be interpreted as requiring a moral inspection or censorship by the Motion Picture Commission of motion picture films that are displayed in any places except in motion picture theaters or in licensed places of amusements."

A paid secretary and assistant are provided for.

The balance of the ordinance is framed on lines similar to the rejected censorship provisions of other ordinances and provides for permits to be issued by the commission after an inspection of the films before exhibited and for penalties to be incurred for the exhibition of any films not authorized. The mayor is made the Court of Appeals from the commission. Permits for the exhibition of any film must be thrown upon the screen for at least ten seconds previous to the exhibition of the film, showing the name of the manufacturer, and books must be kept for public inspection by the exhibitor containing all necessary data in relation to the films shown on the screen. The ordinance is to go into effect sixty days after its approval by the mayor.

The ordinance was referred to the committee on Laws and Legislation for action.

ADMISSION 25.

MONTGOMERY TURNS THEM AWAY.

All sorts of stories of crowded houses in the different towns where F. T. Montgomery is showing the Kalem feature, "From the Manger to the Cross," have been coming to the Moving Picture World for the past several weeks. It is a case of turn them away wherever the picture is shown. The above illustration is from a photograph taken in front of the Montgomery Theater, Atlanta, Ga., while that picture was running. Same everywhere.

"Calamity Anne's Beauty" (American)

Reviewed by James S. McQuade.

MANY a guffaw will greet the presentation of that rough-and-tumble farce comedy known as "Calamity Anne's Beauty," in which Miss Louise Lester, of the American Western Company No. 1, cuts loose in the title role and gives us some side-splitting glimpses of strenuous femininity in the Far West. Miss Lester has furnished several mirthful characterizations in her "Calamity Anne" series, but none quite so broadly comical as the one now under discussion.

Warren Kerrigan plays the part of a handsome young drummer with fine zest, and Jack Richardson is equally at home in the part of the patent medicine doctor. George Periolat gives a good character sketch of the village constable, and W. J. Tedmarsh has a "Weary Willie" make-up that stamps him a veritable knight of the road. Misses Jessalyn Van Trump and Charlotte Burton appear as captivating village belles, while Miss Phyllis Gordon airs her charms prettily as the medicine man's "beauty" assistant.

Scene from "Calamity Anne's Beauty" (American).

The scenes around the medicine man's buggy, as he disposes of his beautifying remedies, show lively action. Calamity Anne's pursuit of the hobo and her effective drubbing of that unfortunate is a scream all the way, as is her bombardment of the fake doctor, whose remedies have brought her gnawing stomach pains instead of facial beauty.

The opening scene shows the handsome drummer on his rounds, chucking pretty girls and lavishing his smiles. He has a smile and a hearty handshake even for plain-featured Anne, who shows her admiration for him and his good looks. One of the pretty girls guesses Anne's feelings, and heartlessly twits her on her homeliness. Then Anne brings out her long unused looking glass and satisfies herself that the taunt is too true. In the midst of her mental distress the "beauty" doctor comes to the village and Anne is lavish in her purchase of his remedies.

Anne's quarters are not inviting. She makes her home in an unused corner of a stable and sleeps on a bed of strewn hay. There we see her by the aid of a lantern light draining two bottles of the remedy at a time, and eagerly searching in the looking glass for a trace of the coveted beauty. Then, resigned, she falls asleep.

In the morning she is awakened by severe intestimal pains, but her first thought is of the mirror, in which she looks vainly for the promised beauty. In deep disgust she throws it in the corner and sets out to interview the "doctor." That worthy and his accomplice exchange smiles as they see Anne approach, and they soon succeed in convincing her that the first remedy must be followed by others, which are to be applied externally. Anne's face is a sight when she retires the following night. What with head bandages, strips of black plaster on her cheeks and a clip on the tip of her nose, she looks like an aboriginal New Zealander.

There is a surprise for Anne that night. A belated hobo espies the half open door of the stable and enters. In the dim light of early morning he fails to see that the place is tenanted, and sinks down on the inviting hay. He awakes Anne and yells out, "The Devil!" as he catches a glimpse of her face. Then he flies for dear life, with Anne close in his wake trying to pepper him with bullets from her .45. The hobo is rescued by a crowd of villagers, just in the nick of time, and Anne hits the war path in the direction of the fake doctor's camp. That worthy and his assistant make a quick get-away, in the midst of a shower of bullets, and Anne wrecks his outfit.

Anne's greatest heartache, however, is yet to come. She pays a visit to that constant friend of hers—her beloved donkey. The animal gazing at her bepatched visage becomes frightened, and gallops madly away. "Calamity Anne's Beauty" will be released Saturday, March 29.

QUICKER THAN THOUGHT—A SHORT REEL (PATHE).

Reviewed by W. Stephen Bush.

THIS film affords a welcome glimpse into the great future of the motion picture. If I were asked to name one film above others showing the educational force of the motion picture I would give this production the preference. It shows the power of the motion picture to popularize science. It is highly useful to the teacher explaining physics and it is not a whit less useful to the exhibitor, because it makes plain to the humblest intelligence some of the most interesting things in the laws of nature. Take the average motion picture patron. He will be interested in these pictures at once and before he has seen it all he will understand things which were unknown to him before. The best of it is that no strain is imposed on the mind; the knowledge is gained as if in play.

The pictures show a thin stream of water rising in the air and supporting a hollow ball, made of glass or thin celluloid. We see such balls dancing on a jet of water in the ordinary shooting gallery quite frequently. If we know nothing about physics the thing seems hard to understand. All of us have watched this thing. The eye is baffled. It cannot follow the motion of the water, as it holds up the ball. Now comes the moving picture camera and shows us how it all happens. These pictures were taken at the rate of 1200 per second and on the screen we see the phenomena a hundred times slower than reality. This is the analysis of motion and I might say in passing that the motion picture is the only minute and accurate measurer of motion. With the aid of the motion picture we now plainly see how the myriads of drops of water are attracted to the ball. The water winds itself around the ball, thus preventing it from falling.

The film shows even stranger things with convincing clearness. It shows us a bullet leaving the end of the barrel of a rifle traveling at the rate of two hundred feet per second. We see the explosion in minutest detail even to the gases arising from the concussion caps. We plainly perceive the recoil and even follow the bullet in its course from the mouth of the rifle to the moment it strikes the ball upon the water. Presently another remarkable thing occurs. The bullet strikes the thin jet of water immediately below the place where the ball dances at the top. The jet is broken, though but for the fraction of a second, the ball loses its support and drops to the ground. These things must interest any audience. The desire to learn is as common as the impulse to breathe and when the trying lessons of physics are treated in this way they are made palatable to every taste.

"OIL ON TROUBLED WATERS"—AN EDUCATIONAL.

"Oil on Troubled Waters" is the title of a two-reel subject soon to be released by the American Film Mfg. Co. This subject is notable as an example of what can be done in an educational way with film stories. The entire picture was made at Summerland, a suburb of Santa Barbara, Cal., notable for its hundreds of oil wells which project out for blocks into the ocean. The story centers around the discovery of oil, and throughout the unfoldment of the story every working part of a mammoth oil well is shown.

"The Toll of Fear" (Lubin)

"THE TOLL OF FEAR," a two-reel picture written, produced and played by Romaine Fielding, the star of the Lubin Company, stationed at Nogales, Ariz., is probably one of the most strange and thrilling photoplays that the firm has ever released. The episode is a veritable reproduction of a circumstance that occurred on the Mexican border, the truth of which is vouched for by local authorities. One of the strange features of the story is that it is told by one man only, Fielding playing the dual role of the two brothers who figured in the tragedy.

Dick McKnight, a deputy sheriff of Santa Cruz County, Ariz., receives a telephone message from Sheriff Wheeler, of the adjoining county, to the effect that Pedro Aquilla and his band of cattle rustlers and outlaws are in San Luis Canyon. His brother, Bill McKnight, the sheriff, being away, the young deputy determines to go out alone and corral some of the gang. He leaves a note to that effect for his brother and starts upon his mission. After getting into the mountains he runs across a note fastened to a tree, which reads: "Go Back or You Die With the Sun."

Dick is not an impressionable young man, but the words make him think and he gives it more weight than is usually given to anonymous communications. He continues on his journey, but cannot get the note out of his mind. As he goes forward the words burn into his brain and every little noise in the mountains startles him until fear grabs him in its deadly grasp and drives him, a frightened thing, into an old abandoned adobe hut, where his nerve is worn to a raw edge by the fear which the words signified to him. He places his pistol to his head, the revolver explodes and we leave him in darkness.

Scene from "The Toll of Fear," (Lubin).

His brother Bill, the sheriff of Santa Cruz County, coming home after a hard ride finds the note that the youngster has left for him and knowing the difficult task that Dick has taken upon himself, he determines to follow his brother. He trails him to the cabin and entering same finds all that is left of a once brave, light-hearted boy. He takes the cursed note from his brother's clenched hand and receives the same fatal suggestion of fear that his brother had felt and when his innocent horse inadvertently rubs his head against the door of the adobe, he is more startled than he has ever been before. He clutches his revolver, running from what seems to him to be a haunted place. He mounts his horse and rides from that which he had loved most, his brother. Continuing madly along divers trails not knowing just what to do, the insidious note causing that destroying thought, fear ever augmenting and increasing until from a brave man, known throughout the territory for his loyalty and bravery, he becomes a cringing, incapable child trying to hide from that thing which is seizing him in its grasp. He attempts to hide in an old abandoned monastery, going back further into the depths of the broken walls until he eventually sinks into a deep crevice, almost an imbecile, firing his revolver at unseen things. The last cartridge of his revolver loosens the old clay and they tumble down upon him, burying him in the tomb. The sun breaks through as we see his hand twitching as he smothers, paying the penalty of the suggestion offered by the piece of paper clenched in his hand even unto the end in the agony of fear.

ONE OF THOSE "NEAR TO DEATH" SCENES.

During the taking of an Essanay feature photoplay, entitled "Fear," Howard Missimer almost lost his life. It was necessary in one of the scenes to have an explosion which was to completely destroy a block house. The explosion occurred in good order and a beam, running across the top, was cracked in two and fell, hitting Missimer on the shoulder and knocking him unconscious. It was fully twenty-five minutes before he was brought to. The physician who attended Mr. Missimer declared the latter's shoulder blade had been broken. Mr. Missimer is at his home under the care of a physician. The enclosed photograph, taken at the time of the explosion, gives a good idea of what and how it happened.

"Robinson Crusoe"

Director Otis Turner of Rex, Makes a Three Part Picture That Will Win Many Hearts.

By H. C. Judson.

IN putting this grand old story into motion pictures, there is one thing only that is of real importance and that is its romance. Let the island seem, at first glimpse, quite unlike our own conception of Crusoe's island, and let (if it so happens) the hut in which he lived be not at all like the pictures of it in the old book, it will matter very little so long as a sense is conveyed to us of his being alone on the island and of his getting solace and happiness from the dumb creatures he has trained. Otis Turner, its producer, has astonished us by his success in giving just this impression. When we have pointed out this fact to the exhibitor, we need add no more. He knows what the story is; we've seen the picture of it and affirm that it leaves nothing to be desired, that is of any importance. Now, if we are right, and we are not in any doubt of that, it is a thoroughly worthy offering. Indeed, we have never seen a picture of this kind that delighted us so much or so warmed our hearts.

Scene from "Robinson Crusoe," (Rex).

The small chance of criticism seems to us uncalled for in a case like this, where the picture offers us such a fine, round sum of entertainment. Perhaps one or two scenes may not be quite as perfect as the best; but the worst will hardly displease any and we feel sure that most will count the whole of it a boon. We did, and we have not escaped the accusation of being critical on one or two occasions. We shall, however, find it a pleasant exercise to point out some of its particularities and the means that Mr. Turner has used in accomplishing the effect he aimed at.

In the first place, it is a one-part picture as much as Hamlet is a one-part drama. And while the role of Crusoe will give no player a call to the heights, it demands an actor who can be absolutely natural and still keep in sympathy with the part. We have seen Enoch Ardens and other shipwrecked sailors played many times; but none have seemed to us so truly what the lines wanted them to seem as this Robinson Crusoe, Robert Leonard. The producer has chosen his important player wisely. Man Friday was, perhaps, a harder role for a white man to play; but it is also carried very well indeed by Edward Alexander. Besides these, there were a large number of savages who had to appear, and in close view of the camera. More than one producer has failed badly in his groups of cannibals, but Mr. Turner has succeeded finely. He must have spent time training them, and the sailors, too.

But the most notable thing in the whole picture is the truth of its stage properties. That old-timer, square rigged ship, to begin with, is a wonder. There's a scene toward the end, where we see it under weigh. We are standing on the deck and looking up at the sails and spars, from which the sailors are shaking out a reef and we feel the very breeze of romance blowing us toward the islands of joy. Then the period of the story is perfectly reflected in the clothing, shoes, hats and weapons—those broad swords also have the stains of romance. We are filled with admiration, too, for the backgrounds; the wreck of the ship and the helter skelter of its rich merchandise; the hut of Crusoe, the rocky part and the sandy part of the beach, the glimpses of the island, the boats of the cannibals and their weapons, all are fine. It took thought to get these things so perfect. This is the chief cause of the picture's success. We might add that the animals in the picture, goats, dog, cat and parrot, are natural and happy.

In preparing the scenario, the wealth of material must have tantalized; yet we have the impression the picture has told the whole story. Surely we would not have anything in it left out, but we can't think of anything that ought to have been in and isn't. It is not only a commendable but a satisfactory offering. The subtitles are quotations; short sentences full of meaning that show what a fine style Defoe had. The picture follows them and they follow it perfectly. And in closing, we may state that the camera work is of fine quality all the way through.

Carmen, Monopol Film, Three Reels.

Reviewed by W. Stephen Bush.

IT is pleasing to note that Marion Leonard, but a short time ago the idol of motion picture patrons the country over, has not lost one jot of her power to charm, entertain and captivate. Moving picture life as it runs on today is too often part humdrum and part hubbub and the fine feature of to-day is forgotten in the sensation of to-morrow. It is well to have something to lay hold of in this sea of uncertainty and confusion; a permanent oasis, that is always refreshing. I think Marion Leonard answers this description. Her cunning and her witchery, her beauty and her talent have given this woman a unique place in the world of motion pictures. We are glad to have her come back to the throne after this interregnum. She is to-day, as she was in the palmy Biograph days, the unrivaled mistress of the silent stage.

Scene from "Carmen," (Monopol).

Indeed it needed all the art of this gifted woman, all her singular charms and graces to make this three-reel production fairly acceptable. But for her striking individuality this filmed version of "Carmen" would have little to commend it to either the exhibitor or the public. "Carmen" had been filmed before, there had been a splendid version by the Pathes, another by the Edison Company and a third, by no means the least meritorious, by a Spanish firm. All these producers followed the libretto of the opera, which in turn was but an adaptation of the novel of Prosper Merimee. To undertake the filming of this old classic with so many fine prototypes in motion pictures must have seemed a bold undertaking. In view, however, of the extraordinary talents of Marion Leonard, who undoubtedly had special qualifications for a clever rendering of "Carmen" the outlook was by means unpromising. Unfortunately the opportunities given to Miss Leonard for displaying her rare gifts are very scant. She is little more than a fleeting apparition on the screen. The famous scene, in which she tempts Jose to sacrifice his honor as a soldier is sadly spoiled; it is badly connected, hurried and incoherent. The spectator feels nothing of the tragic intensity of either opera or novel. This is true of the whole story. Its grand simplicity has been marred by the introduction of absurb incidents and episodes for which no trace of a justification can be found in any version of Carmen. Unnecessary and disturbing action and characters are dragged in by the hair, as it were. There is throughout a shocking misconception of the dramatic moments of the story. Nor is this the worst. Incredible as it may seem, something like half a reel or more is devoted to cowboy-style of riding and to the robbery of a stage coach.

Probably the most tragic and gripping moment in the opera is the last scene, in which Don Jose and Carmen meet. Those last moments when the bold, passionate, beautiful and heartless woman taunts the victim of her wiles into a jealous frenzy by throwing the ring at his feet and the sudden tragic ending have stirred countless audiences to horror and pity. I do not like to record this, but it is an actual fact, that in this filmed version of Carmen the fatal meeting occurs in a tavern and is then adjourned for no reason in particular to a variety of outdoor settings. After a chase, using up about 150 feet of film, comes the mortal thrust. I confess my inability to characterize such ghastly perversions of the first principles of dramatic art. There are said to be no less than four hundred and twenty-six scenes—this is enough to make the most hardened critic shiver. How much better would it have been if there had been less riding and stage coach robbing and more of Marion Leonard. I have no doubt whatever, that Miss Leonard was in sympathy with the character, but I cannot believe that she was in sympathy with her instructions.

The photography was on the whole good, though here and there it seemed as if the picture were slightly out of focus. The support of Miss Marion was just about fair. To those who know Carmen, this filmed edition of it must be an unpleasant surprise by reason of the strange additions and mixtures, while to those unfamiliar with the story it can be nothing more than a bewildering succession of queer and disconnected scenes.

A Selig Picture Dealing with One Possibility of the Political Patronage Evil.

AFFAIRS in Washington have a continuous and universal interest for the people of this free and enlightened republic, and they take a heightened intensity whenever a president is inaugurated and the national household undergoes drastic changes. An insight into some of these details is gained in an important new pictorial production from the Chicago studios of the Selig Polyscope Company. The scenario is by Gilson Willets, whose experience in the capitol is vividly illustrated in the two-reel special "A Change of Administration." While politics and policies may be the engrossing occupations, love-making goes on as usual, as it does in either peace or war, so that heart interest is a strong feature in this picturization.

The story concerns the difficulties of a clerk in the war department, betrothed to the daughter of an ambassador, who loses his position by the change of administration. His fiancee is not pleased with the dismissal of her lover and conspires to bring about the overthrow of his successor. She accomplishes this by purchasing some valuable documents from the new clerk, paying for them in marked money. Later the clerk is accused and the money is found in his possession; he is dismissed from the service and the girl's lover is restored to his old position.

The production was directed by Hardee Kirkland and the leading roles were played by Adrienne Kroell, Charles Clary and William Stowell. The Inaugural Ball scenes are masterpieces of elaborate staging and the dazzling array of costumes worn by those attending, make this particular scene exceedingly interesting.

The picture will be released by the Selig Polyscope Company as a two reel special on Saturday, April 5th. The Selig publicity department have prepared the usual elaborate assortment of publicity aids to accompany this masterpiece.

THERE are some beautiful exteriors in this photoplay and some entirely new effects, notably those of flotation, most of the pictures of action being more closely associated with water than with land. There are conflicts in the lake as well as on houseboat, canoes and rafts, and a peculiar feature is a "castle" or wooden fortress rising out of the water and inaccessible from all save boat attack. But the main purpose of the presentation seems to be that of reviving interest in this first of Cooper's "Leatherstocking Tales."

So far as these adaptations from literary sources are concerned, moving pictures enter the field of interpretative criticism. Those people who rarely interest themselves in the almost forgotten tales of other days may find much generosity and faithfulness of detail in these interpretations of past works of well-known authors, great pains being taken to make the author's main ideas easily available by briefer statement. A great difficulty in producing these abridgements is that of selecting the best that a story presents—it is so easy to magnify insignificant details while dwarfing important incidents.

In this Cowboy-and-Indian period of motion-picture evolution, this era of revolver and scalping knife, of fringed trousers, war paint and feather bonnets, the supreme delight of five-year-old boys, a revival of James Fenimore Cooper's stories seems highly appropriate, and a view of the early pioneers comes as a relief—they accomplished something. We who are living in protected comfort today may glimpse the hardships of those who struggled that we might enjoy a measure of freedom.

In fidelity of "holding the mirror up to nature," this photoplay is to be highly commended. It is superior to most of its kind in faithfulness of portraiture and in interpreting the tendency of the times it depicts. It must be difficult for the director to keep his head level amid the spectacular piroueting and cavorting of cowboys, indians, sheriffs and villains of the deepest dye. How in the world is he to be in sympathy with any movement that is being honestly made towards improvement in public taste through pictures that sense the finer spirit of our people? It is to be hoped that moving pictures will not go the way and share the fate of cheap chromos.

The Vitagraph Company is presenting a bill of large variety, hence it may be well for them to give further interpretation of Cooper's novels. My objection to adaptation from such sources is based upon the fact that few novels contain a theme which can be framed readily and in its entirety by the limitations of a picture play. The latter requires a continuous adventure of swift development, moving rapidly before our eyes. Works of fiction may probe all the depths of human experience with deliberation, may even set the main action aside while an underplot is being developed. Not so with the photodrama.

The photodrama is better suited to vivid action projected with tremendous energy into limitations of space and time. Among its greatest difficulties are those of preparation and exposition, of placing characters, of establishing their identity and peculiarities so that their conduct is logical and interest in what they do swiftly aroused. The best photoplays are those stories written especially for screen presentation, but there is room for careful adaptations, and I do not hesitate to endorse these when they have merit and are not out of all numerical proportion to others to be placed on the exhibitor's program, even "Deerslayers," declared by Mark Twain to be Cooper's worst novel.

The great humorist said that J. Fenimore committed 114 offences against literary art on one page out of a possible 115, also that the only restful portions in it were where some white man did not step on a dry twig and rouse redskins for miles around, especially when absolute silence was worth four dollars a minute. None of these little imperfections, however appear in the photoplay. Pictures cover all mannerisms and faults of speech and often, as in this case, give a complete and instantaneous comprehension of the author's meaning, with no sense of effort or consciousness of the intervening medium. They clarify the underlying throught and crystallize the form of expression.

PATHE PLAYERS IN REAL WRECK.

While returning from Saranac Lake, N. Y., on the morning of Sunday, March 23, Leo D. Wharton and a company of Pathe players had a rather unpleasant experience in a railroad wreck. The train which was bearing them to New York jumped the track and bumped along on the ties for several hundred feet before stopping. All the company were sleeping comfortably when the jolt came. A roll-call revealed that none was seriously injured, though it is said several convinced the railroad claim agent to the tune of a few hundred dollars for damages, real or fancied. It is also recorded that Gwendolyn Pates slept serenely through it all.

CHICAGO LETTER

By JAS. S. McQUADE

ANYONE familiar with the proceedings of the meetings held in New York, March 20 and 21, between officials of the Universal Film Manufacturing Company and representatives and owners of about thirty-two exchanges which purchase the product of that company, cannot fail to be impressed that the affairs of this independent concern are in a critical condition and that the outlook for concerted action between manufacturers and exchanges is discouraging. It was thought that the meeting held in the Sherman House, this city, October 5th last, at which the board of directors of the Universal and fourteen independent exchange men not engaged in the manufacture of films were present, had restored harmony by outlining policies that were acceptable to both sides in the controversy. Six months have not elapsed since then, yet a break between Universal manufacturers and the exchanges now seems inevitable.

The charge is made by the exchanges in question that the Universal manufacturers have not kept the pledges made at that October 5th meeting. It is charged that they have failed to furnish films of the promised quality and that they have forwarded these exchanges certain films of such inferior quality that they and their customers have suffered serious loss thereby. The hardship imposed by the manufacturers in forcing the exchanges to take such films without inspection and pay 10 cents per foot for them, irrespective of their inferiority, and without redress, injured the customers of the exchanges and diminished the volume of business done by the latter.

The complaining exchanges, now all members of the Independent Exchange Company, will number 36 when they meet in New York, March 27 and 28, to hold a final conference with the Universal board of directors. This, it is said, will leave about 10 exchanges in line with the Universal. The members of the Independent Exchange Company assert that they have already made full provision for securing ample and high class weekly programs for their customers, in case they cannot arrange acceptable terms with the directors of the Universal. They also assert that their policy is not destructive, but for the uplift of the business, a something which they claim cannot be promoted under existing conditions.

It is hoped that a further break in the independent ranks will be averted. It will simply mean more competing forces in the same restricted field and, therefore, increased friction. It will not contribute to a better quality of film, nor will it in the end lead to better programs for exhibitors. The board of directors of the Universal can well afford to make concessions in the interests of harmony.

Ten Hens' Eggs Admission to Picture Shows.

The Chicago Tribune gives the information that Capt. Brackett of the U. S. Marine Corps, lieutenant governor and chief justice of the island of Guam, in the Philippines, is home on a vacation. The captain, with the other handles to his name, describes the felicities of the island as follows:

"Everyone is happy there. Kindness and love, and baseball, and moving pictures are all there is to life. And what more could be wished?

"We established a moving picture show and the natives are wild over it. It gives them the only motive they have for doing work, and now every woman on the island has taken to raising chickens, as ten hen's eggs will secure admission to the show."

If Chicago patrons of our picture theaters were forced to pay proportionate admissions, at the present price of eggs, they would appreciate pictures more highly. The Tribune editor views the matter humorously thus: "With true instinct they (the Guamese) selected eggs because the hen could do most of the work." What about the rooster?

The General Film Company vs. Sam Schiller.

The General Film Company has brought suit in the Circuit Court of Cook County, Ill., by Cooney & Verhoeven; their attorneys and solicitors in Chicago, in replevin against Samuel Schiller, owner of the Schiller Theater, this city.

The papers in the case show that a reel of film was recently replevined. It was entitled "The Banker's Daughter," made by the Kalem Company some time ago. The film was turned over to the sheriff when he served the writ.

Mr. Verhoeven informs me that on the following morning he made a demand for another film, "The Battle Hymn of the Republic," produced by the Vitagraph Company of America. This film was turned over to him after making the demand.

A banquet was tendered Mr. and Mrs. Maurice Fleckles by the office force of the Laemmle Film Service, Chicago, in the College Room of the La Salle Hotel, Saturday, March 22nd. Forty people attended the banquet, which was a very pleasant and successful affair. Tom Norman was toastmaster and several happy speeches were made.

The spread was given in honor of Mr. and Mrs. Fleckles, who will sail for Europe, April 2nd. The happy pair greatly appreciated the efforts of the employees by responding to a neat toast.

Tom Quigley, one of the best entertainers in the city, and his wife were present. Between courses Mr. Quigley sang his famous cabaret songs in a pleasing manner. Among those present were: Tom Norman, Louis Laemmle, I. L. Lesserman, Abe Stern, Claude Erby, John A. McCann, E. A. Westcott, Hugo Amberg, and F. A. Van Husan, of the Laemmle Film Service, Omaha, Neb.

Chicago Picture Houses Must Have Pure Air.

"Pure air prevents pollution, promotes pleasure, and produces patronage.

"A theater is not always as sweet as it smells. Some blow pleasing perfumes into the air to disguise offensive body odors; but that doesn't purify the air.

"In addition to a proper system of ventilation a theater should be thrown wide open hours before the public is admitted and should be thoroughly aired between succeeding performances.

"Every precaution should be taken to exclude the sick or ailing, especially children with throats tied up, rashes or those having bad colds.

"The more precautions you take to protect your patrons the better your reputation and the greater your patronage.

"Your best advertisement is cleanliness: Cleanliness of air, of house, of program."

Dr. Young says the health department has been correcting ventilating faults in many of the older picture houses, and those who fail to comply with the departmental requirements by July 1 will be closed until the repairs are made. The old method of bringing suit against offenders has been abandoned, as litigation usually takes about seven months Instead, the licenses will be revoked when renewal time comes around.

Big Chicago Daily in Support of Moving Pictures.

Hearst's Chicago American made a notable departure in the issue of Saturday, March 15. Two full pages were devoted to moving pictures and advertisements from the trade. Among the latter was quite a "spread" from Jones, Linick & Schaefer's Orpheum Theater, on State street.

The announcement was made that this department would appear in the American every Saturday, under the editorship of Tom Bourke, a young newspaper man of fine ability and ambition. Mr. Bourke was formerly the American's vaudeville expert, and is well known throughout the theatrical world.

The following paragraph appeared in the opening announcement: "As there are recognized factions striving for leadership in the motion picture world, this department begins without prejudice and will remain non-partisan. The whole object will be to furnish such cosmopolitan news as will broaden the scope of motion pictures."

The American is congratulated on its venture, and the Chicago branch of the Motion Picture Exhibitors League would do well to take steps in support of the movement.

A Glowing Future for Moving Pictures.

A special cable to the Chicago News from Berlin, March 15, conveys the information that Hermann Sudermann, the noted German author, has sold his rights to "Der Katzensteeg," one of his finest romances, to a film manufacturer for $15,000 and a percentage of the gross receipts. Herr Sudermann ranks among the most famous literary men of Europe at the present time, and his opinion of the future of the moving picture cannot fail to exert considerable influence.

"The kinematograph," says Herr Sudermann, "has passed the blood and thunder and neurotic love story stage, and will now deal with current events. In the future it will be a great medium for presenting the public with genuinely artistic ideas."

Herr Sudermann cites the recent artistic moving picture success of Max Reinhardt's "The Miracle," at the Covent Garden opera, in London, and also the present use of moving pictures at the Berlin Royal opera, by means of which otherwise impossible scenic effects in the Wagner operas are produced. These cases he regards as convincing evidence of the high estimate placed by German artistic leaders on the aid afforded by the kinematograph. In connection with the sale of the rights of "Der Katzensteeg," it is stated that Gerhardt Hauptmann's last novel, "Atlantis," will shortly be seen in moving pictures.

It would appear that the time is not far distant when film manufacturers will vie with each other to secure the rights to great, current, popular novels, for use in the big features of the future. Everything points to the elimination of the cheap scenario, and to higher admissions to picture theaters, where the highest efforts in kinematography will be seen.

Chicago Film Brevities.

Wm. Lee, who has worked in the capacities of producer, scenario writer and character actor with the American Film Manufacturing Co., for the past year and a half, has resigned. The closing of the Film's Eastern studio for the winter months necessitated the change. Mr. Lee is anxious to secure an appointment as producer with some good film manufacturing firm, as his advertisement elsewhere in this issue shows. Mr. Lee had several years' experience with other film manufacturing companies, prior to his engagement by the American.

L. T. Osborn, formerly owner of the Isis Theater, Trinidad, Col., was in Chicago, Saturday, March 22, and paid a visit at the office of the Moving Picture World. Mr. Osborn sold the Isis to Jack Nash, a local newspaper man, who took possession March 1. Mr. Osborn is now touring the country east, as far as New York, and will take in most of the principal cities on his way. He states that he has been very successful in the purchase of "dead" houses, which he has made profitable. He has turned four such houses into good paying investments (all situated in Colorado) within the past five years. Mr. Osborn stated that he may locate either in Oklahoma or Arizona in the near future, and that he has several houses lined up in Texas. Mr. Osborn owes much of his success to the fact that he is an expert newspaper man, having been connected with some of Hearst's and other dailies in large cities. He is editor and owner of the Isis News in Trinidad, which is devoted exclusively to news of the drama, moving pictures and vaudeville.

He is now building the Kimbark, a handsome house that will seat between 700 and 800 people, situate at 6240-42 Kimbark Avenue. The Kimbark will be finished some time in the early summer. It will cost between $42,000 and $45,000, not including the site. The Decorators' Supply Company, of Chicago, will install the interior decorations, and the Northwestern Terra Cotta Supply Company has contracted to build the front. The admission to the new house will be 10 cents.

W. W. Watts, president of the Vaudette Amusement Company and manager of the Vaudette Theater, Springfield, Ill., writes that he is having remarkable success with "From the Manger to the Cross," for which he holds the State rights for Illinois. On March 16th a presentation was given at the First Christian Church, of which the Rev. Frederick Burnham is minister. Mr. Burnham gave a lecture as the films were run off, and appropriate vocal and instrumental music assisted in making the scenes still more impressive. Some of the ministers in the other churches in Springfield announced the presentation in the First Christian Church from their pulpits, and these congregations attended in large crowds for the second presentation at Mr. Burnham's church. The event was prominently discussed by the local press in advance.

MACE'S PROP LIST.

Lately there was a police and fireman's benefit in Los Angeles and the motion picture people were quick to respond. Fred Mace, of Keystone and the Photoplayers' Club, was one of the first to respond with a "nearly" quartet composed of himself, Charles Murray, Gus Pixley and David M. Hartford. Dick Ferris, who had charge of the stage, warned him that unless he sent in his prop list at least the day before he would not get what he asked for. This is the prop list that Mace sent in. We do not think that Mr. Ferris found many of the items:

MACE QUITS KEYSTONE.

Last Monday, Fred Mace, comedian and producer with the Keystone company, wired his resignation to Kessler and Bauman, to take effect a week from to-day. He has been in treaty with several managers both on the independent and licensed sides and it is not yet known what offer he has accepted.

DOUGHERTY LEAVES BIOGRAPH.

Lew E. Dougherty, for years connected with the Biograph Company in various capacities, but for the last few years editor of scenarios, has resigned from that company and joined Kinemacolor, to take effect April 1. The reason given for the change is that Mr. Dougherty desires to remain in California permanently, while his work with the Biograph Company would necessitate his returning to New York for half of the year. Mr. Dougherty will have charge of the scenario department of Kinemacolor, vice Anita Hendrie Miles, resigned.

Doings at Los Angeles

"Spec" Woods Joins Universal—Other Universal Changes—Vitagraph Comedy Hit—News Briefs.

THE addition of two more directors to the list of those employed by the Universal company at the Western studios in this city has been the occasion for a general re-assignment of the directors among the companies. The new directors are Frank E. Woods, formerly of the Kinemacolor, and Bob Leonard, heretofore one of the leading men with Otis Turner's Rex company.

The directors and their brands, under the new schedule, are as follows: Nestor brand, Al E. Christie, Thomas Ricketts, Frank E. Montgomery and Jack O'Brien; Bison brand, Francis Ford, Milton H. Fahrney, Wilfred Lucas and Henry McRae; Rex brand, Otis Turner, Phillips Smalley and Bob Leonard; Powers brand, J. Farrel MacDonald, H. Matthews and Albert W. Hale. Frank Woods has not been assigned, but, according to rumor, he will probably be given a Powers company unless it is decided to create a new brand. Mrs. Smalley, who appears on the screen under her professional name of Lois Weber, is assisting her husband, and Francis Ford has an assistant in the person of Fred W. Randolph, who, it is said, is to have the next directorship which opens. He had charge of the company which returned from Hawaii recently, and the pictures he brought back were well liked. Another actor who is being groomed for a directorship is Ray Myers, who is working in Ford's company.

Otis Turner's company has finally returned from Catalina, bringing back the last scenes in the "Robinson Crusoe" production which has been in preparation as a Rex release for about a month. Bob Leonard was Crusoe, Edward Alexander was Friday, Charles Travis was the captain, and Margarita Fischer was his daughter. The last scene was made on the island late in the afternoon and about half an hour before the company caught the boat for the return trip. It was the big scene, in which a party of cannibals was shown rushing Robinson Crusoe's camp. About 100 extra people were used as cannibals. The hour was growing late, and only one spool of film was left of all the company had taken over. Turner was rushing to catch the boat and save an extra day's pay of all the extra people. The scene was rehearsed once or twice and then the camera started. As the cannibals emerged, whooping and dancing, from the brush around the camp, Turner uttered a cry of anguish and stopped the camera. One of the leading cannibals was frisking about in the foreground, vigorously puffing a bulldog pipe. Only the fact that there was barely enough film left to take the scene over saved him from the deadly vengeance of the irate director.

The only other accident in connection with the picture was sustained by Leonard, who lost a piece of one ear in the beak of his "pet" parrot.

Life is one constant round of excitement at Oak Crest. In a single day last week there was a big battle scene pulled off by one director, another used blasting powder to lift a tree out of the ground, roots and all, in order to disclose the buried treasure; a third produced a scene in a war picture where a series of underground bombs were exploded in front of a cavalry charge, and a fourth director burned an entire Western town to the ground. General Manager Kennedy is planning to shoot an actor or two in front of the camera for the sake of realism and excitement.

Vitagraph Comedy Hit.

The hobo comedy recently released by the Vitagraph company, under the name of "A Corner in Crooks," made such a hit everywhere it was shown that a second, and perhaps a series, is to be attempted. The picture was produced by Rollin S. Sturgeon at the Western studio at Santa Monica, and Robert Thornby and George C. Stanley had the two tramp leads. They will appear in "Shorty and Sandy," another of the same kind, which has just been completed.

The location of the new Western Vitagraph studio at Santa Monica has been selected, but not announced. Director Sturgeon and his company will remain in the present location, on Ocean Avenue, until the new place is ready for use. There will be provisions for six sets, and there will be three directors—Sturgeon, Thornby and another director whose name has not been announced. The output of the studio is to be greatly increased, and by way of preparing for this Sturgeon is laying in a stock of photoplays. Three readers have been engaged to make selections. W. Hanson Durham, scenario editor for the company, fell downstairs at the Photoplayers' Club on the opening night of the rooms and broke one of his knee caps. He is still in the hospital, but has turned his sickroom into an office and is doing his work without interruption. Sturgeon and several of the members of the company were at Catalina last week, making a marine picture, and next week they are going back to use the same backgrounds in a Japanese romance in which there will be parts for Edwin August, Robert Thornby, Mary Charleson, Anne Schaefer and Margaret Gibson, the latter the most recent addition to the company. Both the Catalina scenarios were furnished by William E. Wing.

News Briefs.

In stating, last week, that the "Third" Biograph release is being made by Tony O'Sullivan, the writer was in error. O'Sullivan is the third director, but he has been assigned to the Monday release, and David Griffith, the original Biograph producer, is personally directing the Saturday releases, which are really the "Third" Biographs. The mid-week comedies will, as heretofore, be directed by Dell Henderson.

William Selig, head of the Selig Polyscope Company, arrived here from Chicago this week, after having been expected almost daily for a couple of months. Business matters in Chicago kept him there beyond the usual time for his annual visit. He will probably be here for a month.

Richard Garrick, formerly one of the Universal producers, has opened an office in the California Building and will make a business of furnishing extra people for the various motion picture companies operating in this field. Already he has a list of more than 500 persons who have had more or less experience in the pictures and who are open for occasional engagements. The scheme is one which will save much trouble for the studios and the actors, and it will probably prove profitable for Garrick.

William Paley, formerly a camera man for the old Nestor Film Company, has brought suit against David Horseley, former proprietor of the Nestor company, asking damages for an injury which he sustained a year ago, and which cost him his right foot and part of the leg. While engaged in taking scenic pictures for the Nestor company among the mountains of Nevada he was tipped out of a buggy on a mountain trail. His right foot was crushed, and when an infection set in later, amputation was necessary. His companion in the buggy had an arm broken. Paley was in the hospital for several months, and on several occasions it was thought he could never recover. He is still a prisoner at his little home, 1460 Belleview Avenue, but he is cheerful at the prospects of being able to move about on crutches a little later. The small fund which was raised for him and his wife—both of them are past the age of 70 years—by friends and in the industry is nearly exhausted, the hospital and other bills having made heavy demands upon it. Paley is a skillful mechanic and an expert on motion picture cameras. He hopes to be able to accumulate enough money to establish a little shop where he will have the necessary equipment to repair, and even to build, motion picture cameras, and he thinks possibly that his many friends in the industry might then send him enough business to enable him to keep himself and his wife above the poverty line.

Director Henderson of one of the two Thanhouser companies now working in Los Angeles is putting on a film production of "Carmen." It will possibly be released as a two-reel feature.

P. M. POWELL.

"LIVING STATUE" WEEK!

If you'd hit Thanhouser studio the other week you'd thought the players had gone into the living statue business. There they were, a'holding rigid, and all for a purpose and a picture, of course! First came Lila Chester, Dave Thompson and Carl Leviness costumed as "dummies." In the film called "The Wax Lady," released Sunday, March 30, you will find them in the show window of the heartless merchant. Miss Chester plays the Lady. The Thanhouser Kidlet, even, had a "hold still" pose, for the part of the doll in "The Spoiled Darling's Doll," out Friday, April 4. She makes a very natural doll, too, and doesn't look at all alive; so when you see her doing cute doll tricks you think her an ingenious mechanical toy.

AMERICAN'S WESTERN STUDIO NEARS COMPLETION.

The grading and foundation work having been completed, the American's property at Santa Barbara is beginning to assume shape with the erection of the first big building of the new studio. This is the administration building, and is surrounded by two giant Mission towers. Over 8,000 cubic yards of earth were removed in the actual leveling of the property, a figure that will give some conception of the size of the new structure.

THE LATEST EDUCATIONAL—X-RAY, MICRO-BIOLOGY.

By Rev. W. H. Jackson.

In a recent issue, mention was made of the latest Gaumont success in the production of films, in which the photographs were taken by the aid of the X-Ray and the microscope. The first of these releases shows the wonderful experiments made with a living frog.

Circulation—Is first exposed and explained under the following divisions:

(a) Movement of the heart of a frog. It is more than interesting to see the heart in action, throbbing and pumping as it sends the blood forward.

(b) Circulation of blood in Mesenteric vessels of a frog.

(c) Circulation in the capillaries of a frog.

(f) Assembling the Spirilles in the hen.

While all these seem very scientific, it must not be supposed that they are too much so for ordinary purposes. Under all circumstances people of average intelligence will find themselves intensely interested; while for schools they will be of great service on account of the instantaneous teaching they impart.

Human Blood—(a) Child's blood under the most powerful microscope.

These pictures carry their own interest and will be as valuable to the laity as to the professionals.

Parasites in the Intestines of a Frog—(a) Opalines, greatly magnified.

(b) Balantidiums, among the most primitive forms of parasites.

(c) Hexamitus, these navigate by means of propellers or oars.

The film shows two kinds, the transparent and the opaque.

The working of these parasites is an education in itself, the chief value of the subject will lie, however, in the verbal additions to the titles, in the classroom if this can be given, no more valuable pictures can be used.

Spirilles and Bacteria of Dentary Tartar—Bacteria of water, showing vast numbers of primitive creatures maneuvering in supposedly clean water. While there is something about this subject not entirely new, the new process whereby these pictures are taken show a detail and conspicuousness not revealed before.

Muscular Movements of the Intestines—This is a tremendously interesting series, the effects of drugs upon the intestines is shown by enlargements or contractions, as well as by the muscular spasms which follow the uses of sulphate of soda and other medicines.

It is at first difficult to calculate the possibilities of the researches now opened by X-ray micro-photography, it does seem, however, that the first great value lies in its power to bring difficult and scientific subjects within the range of the average youth of both sexes; knowledge of first importance is now theirs and when other fields of a more domestic nature have been opened up the coming generation will be the greatest gainers.

"FIRE."

By Rev. W. H. Jackson.

This Eclair release is a very interesting and complete history and description of Fire, its origin, powers and purposes. It is not often that a subject of so broad a nature can be so effectively reduced to the limits of one reel, and yet be made so thorough and complete; people to whom the subject may not present any interest, are at once pleased and edified: while to the scholar a very valuable lesson is learned in an exceedingly short space of time, in a way that makes forgetting difficult.

The first picture shows man in his primitive state, starting a fire by striking the rock and flint stone until the spark is produced, and fallen dry leaves starts to burning which he blows into a flame, and feeds until a great fire results.

Fire Worshipped.

"Fire," as a source of power has been honored as a divinity since the remotest times. In India "Fire" was worshipped under the form of the god Agni. Pictures of this god are shown under various conditions and explained that "This god held in his hands fans to stir the fire." In this way a profitable piece of information is introduced relative to the origin and purpose of this form of superstition and idolatry. "Agni" is also shown as representing the Sun, and is seated on a Ram: the ram being the first sign of the zodiac.

Fire in Religion.

Fire or Light is symbolized in religion by various devices. The Christian religion is represented by the light-giving Cross, presumably the makers intended rightly to depict the Cross as "The Light of the World," we will at any rate interpret their purpose as such. The Persian religion has as its symbol, the cross-formed device known as the "Swastika," which when the four arms are formed in acute rather than right angles is named the "Suavastika." When these crosses are made to revolve very rapidly they become the Persian symbols of motion. In the old Roman Empire, a beautiful picture shows, priestesses or vestals paying homage to the Sun by incessantly tending to the "Sacred Fire." To this point much that is important concerning the place of fire in religion will be helpful in explaining many otherwise ambiguous ideas in ancient history.

The Science of Fire. Valuable Experiments.

A very interesting study in natural science is now given with much detail. Solar rays, concentrated on a piece of tinder by a magnifying glass set it on fire. To the average school-boy this is not new, this fact will help him forward, however, to other and more interesting pieces of information. "By drying certain woods under the Equatorial Zone, Solar rays permit dry wood to be ignited by friction."

"The native of these regions obtain sparks and start their fires by the rotary movements of a stick."

"A piece of tinder at the extremity of a simply made piston is ignited by the sudden compression of air."

"Flames render fire visible; it is the oxygen in the air that generally causes combustion."

"Combustion by oxygen makes the flame very ardent in its superior parts, and gives it an ultra violet color."

All these experiments are made on the screen just as thoroughly as if in science room of the school, and save much time, as without doubt the whole of these tests are shown on the screen in quicker time and more completely, than any one of them could be shown in actual practice.

Experiments with Heat and Gases.

A piece of tin is placed on a piece of card-board and held over a flame, the tin immediately melts while the card showing greater resistance lasts longer. The difference as conductors of heat between glass and metals, is shown by suitable tests. The boiling of water by conducted, rather than direct heat is proved. Natural or phosphorescent gases are set on fire by the oxygen in the air, these emanate from marshy grounds and cemeteries. The nature and danger of "Firedamp" in mines is explained by graphic illustrations.

A simple lesson is taught to children by means of the Fourth of July "sparkler" which proves that all flames and sparks do not possess a burning heat. Experiments with sodium in water are fully revealed, its explosive powers and intense heat-developing qualities.

The last picture is of a miniature volcano, and is given to show that "central fire is caused by the formidable compression of the terrestrial atoms." Many a school will gladly use this picture, and any exhibitor who gets it, will fall short of his own interests, if he does not call the attention of the local educators to the valuable film he is showing.

A NEW RELIGIOUS SUBJECT.

A pleasing subject is this, showing light upon the far from home efforts of the godly Sisters of Mercy among the "waifs and strays" of China. Some interest is added by the coloring of the pictures as the natural beauties of the country demand. A reward is paid by these Sisters to whoever brings a foundling which they immediately adopt in their institution.

Pictures showing "how they lavish motherly care upon these forsaken little ones" are very fine. If an interest had need to be aroused to encourage this noble work, the exhibition of these pictures would more than secure it.

Play is just as important and indulged in with the same child-like enthusiasm as anywhere. Industrialism is, however, very much emphasized. The little people are taught gardening, and as this is both a science and an art in China, it is not surprising that they attain such perfection when they begin so young. Girls are also taught lace making, and the deftness of their little fingers is simply wonderful. The boys are taught rice-straw mat making, at which they prove both efficient and profitable in a very short time.

The religious exercises are, of course, made very important by these godly women, who know both the value and power of early training, there may result more wide-spread influence from the work among this class of children free from caste, than otherwise could accrue. It is commendable for the Eclair people to take such pictures as this when their artists are on the ground; may such good result therefrom.

M. P. EXPOSITION NOTES.

Mr. Frank E. Samuels, enroute to the London Exposition wires the Exposition Committee that he is having a fine trip. He is making the journey as the representative of the Motion Picture Exhibitors League Exposition Committee.

Fred A. Clark, New York manager of the Enterprise Optical Mfg. Co., who have taken spaces 327 and 328 (see plan in Jan. 4 issue), to boost the Motiograph Machine at the New York exposition, he says his company will be there strong.

The American Machine Company, manufacturers of the Standard Machine, have declared themselves in for a good size space at the New York Moving Picture Exposition and will have an exhibit second to none.

Mr. Olmsted, of the American Seating Company, is anxious to furnish all of the four model theaters on the mezzanine floor with different styles of opera chairs.

Bell & Howell Company, of Chicago, designers of motion picture apparatuses, will be there with something new and interesting.

A letter from the J. H. Genter Company, manufacturers of the "Mirroroide" screens and curtains, to Mr. Samuels, says: "We assure you we take great interest in this exposition and will immediately go ahead and prepare for same."

The Lang Manufacturing Company, who secured preferred space some time ago, now write that they would like to contribute their latest film rewinders and film reels to be used in the four model theaters at the exposition.

From Oklahoma comes the glad tidings that delegates to the Third Annual Convention and Motion Picture Trades Exposition, will be accompanied by an Indian band from the state reservation. These Indians are said to be right there with the real noise and will show New Yorkers how the red man can double in brass. Another band will be here from Texas composed of cowboys.

From Oshkosh, Wis., the Oshkosh Metal Products Co. will be represented in spaces 211 and 212. From a letter received from Mr. R. R. Hartley, it seems that they are preparing a surprise for the trade.

The Precision Machine Company, Inc., think so well of the exposition that they some time ago secured spaces 319, 320, 321 and 322 in the very heart of the territory allotted to projection machine manufacturers.

Mr. S. M. Spedon, of the Vitagraph Company, of America, is arranging something out of the ordinary for the Vitagraph Booth.

Among the large electric companies, the up-to-date news is as follows: The United Electric Light Company and the Edison Company have sent their contracts in while the General Electric Company are expected to close within a few days. The Fort Wayne Electric Works are also figuring on a novel exhibition.

The number of letters received from foreign manufacturers had a great deal to do with Mr. Samuel's trip to Europe. It would seem that from the tone of most of the letters, that our foreign friends are greatly interested in our exposition and it is confidently expected by the committee that Mr. Samuels will return with the signed contracts of many European manufacturers.

Under a special act of Congress, secured this year by the International Exposition Company, of the New Grand Central Palace, all goods for exhibition purposes may be brought into the United States free. This will enable foreign manufacturers to send their exhibits to the Motion Picture Trades Exposition without the annoyance and expense of custom duties.

Foreign Trade Notes

BRITISH NOTES.

By Our Own Correspondent.

WAR in the trade has started now with a vengeance. The Pathe ultimatum to oust the renter from recognition by supplying direct to the exhibitor is being most vehemently resented not only by the Renters' Association, but also by a large proportion of the exhibitors themselves.

Not only the British stage celebrity, but the literary celebrity are making good use of the kinema. I hear on most reliable authority that Anna Pavlowa, the famous Russian ballet dancer, has at last consented to be filmed. She has been approached several times, but has hitherto most strongly declined. She will appear in Rubinstein's terpsichorean allegory, "Night." Probably the Marchioness Townsend, who is now having another photoplay, entitled "A Strong Man's Love," produced by the Clarendon Company, was primarily responsible for the inclusion of Mr. Jack London and Mr. E. Phillips Oppenheim in the ranks of picture playwrights. They have entered into an arrangement with a London firm to write two scenarios a week and, as both writers have contributed extensively to American publications, their films should prove safe investments for the American showman.

Newcastle exhibitors are organizing a "health week," during which it has been agreed by the various picture theater proprietors that none but instructive pictures on health topics will be shown.

At the London County Council elections this month the Sunday closing of picture theaters will figure as an important issue. The exhibitors association is to ask every candidate for election to give a definite answer to a question as to whether he is in favor of Sunday opening.

The seating capacity of London halls has just been re-estimated. That of theaters is given at 67,000, and that of music halls, 73,000. The picture theater accommodation is 55,000.

Edison's New York manager, H. G. Plimpton, has been touring both London and the provinces. He intends to return to New York immediately, having already been on the Continent.

A patent application has been taken out in this country for the production of moving picture films in color and black-and-white by a new process which makes the isochromatic effect optional. Also a new unbreakable lantern slide is to be patented.

E. H. Montagu, Selig's London agent, has hit on a novel idea of advertising his company's new productions. The title, in a circular he has sent out is made out and printed in picture language.

The Kinema Shooting gallery is London's newest adaption of the moving picture. The competitors fire with rifles at the images as they appear on the screen which is specially constructed of a material that admits light from the other side whenever a bullseye is scored. In conjunction with this arrangement there is also an attachment for stopping the films in the "gate" instantly so that an inspection of the target can be made. There is some talk of submitting the idea to the military authorities and the films I have already seen suitable for animated targets include pictures of motor cars whizzing around dangerous corners, horses galloping, men running and birds on the wing.

The American Sportsman-Kinematographer, Paul J. Rainey, has been the recipient of an honor unprecedented in the history of the trade to an American. Last night (Thursday, March 6th) the pictures illustrating Mr. Rainey's African hunting experiences were shown to a select audience in Buckingham Palace by express command of the King, whose attention had previously been attracted to the unique character of the films and the daring patience required to obtain them. Some sixty invited guests were present in addition to their Majesties King George and Queen Mary and the machine and screen were temporarily erected in the sumptuous ballroom of Buckingham Palace. Mr. Rainey who is still in Africa on fresh enterprises has been notified of the event.

An American photoplayer who will not trust me with his name and who has been working in this country for some time says that in London the picture actor is the most casual employee on earth.

£80,000 for a kinema location was regarded as fairly heavy expenditure when a new show opened in London some months ago but what must certainly be the limit is being exploited by a newly formed London company with a capital of £125,000. In fact the building in Coventry Street, London is now almost completed and is to open under the name of the "West End Kinema" in a month or so. The company paid £80,000 for the site and the remainder will be spent on the building which is of heavy Portland stone and decorated inside with silk satin, hand painted frescoes, marble staircases and mosaic floors. There are to be two restaurants and the theater will be the first in London to remain open from one till midnight. An electrical device on the front will give the effect of sunshine beating down on the entrance.

Are any American exhibitors seriously troubled by the mischievous youth who, imagining he is having a fine joke, scatters electric snuff from the upper regions of the auditorium? Two managers here have this week seriously complained to me over the nuisance which proved simply intolerable to the patrons and more so to the orchestra. In a case at Birmingham the fine particles of the snuff arose and found their way into the operating box where the man at the wheel was nearly blinded. Finally a solution was evolved by the screening of a slide soliciting the cooperation of the audience in the detection of the offenders and one youth was caught and prosecuted.

The first public house or saloon in England to run a kinema as an attraction has opened at Pelworth. Two shows are given each evening and the place is regularly patronized by the villagers. It might be as well to mention that the nearest kinema theater is 17 miles away.

Jack London, the eminent author has just sent to London from the Pacific 10,000 ft. of undeveloped film illustrating savage life in the islands. Mr. Martin Johnson has charge of the films which may be released shortly.

Miss Lottie Briscoe, the American photoplayer is described in an interview she has had with a London weekly as the lady who needs 20 trunks for her wardrobe. Miss Briscoe does not advise any woman to take up play-acting as a profession. In fact she whimsically describes her pet hobby as "answering letters from stage struck girls."

* * *

The London Education authorities will shortly install the kinema in six London schools. Travel and industrial films will be shown to the children as part of the ordinary curriculum.

Advertising for Exhibitors

Conducted by EPES WINTHROP SARGENT

Again, the Specials.

HERE'S a letter from an Eastern exhibitor who opens a question that appeals to many readers of this department. He writes:

> Please advise me, through the "Advertising" department, if you consider it advisable for a small-town theater, with a seating capacity of 300, and drawing from a total population of 3,500, to play big States rights pictures in five reels or more. Do such pictures decrease in price as they grow old, or is a new print used when the first becomes worn? What is about the lowest price per day? What would you suggest as the best method of advertising and the maximum price of admission for such pictures? For obvious reasons, you will please omit my name when publishing the answers to the above queries.

We most assuredly think it will pay the small-town manager to get the big things if he can get them at a price that will enable him to break even or even a little under that, but with clever work we think that even with a seating capacity of 300 and a town of 3,500 it should be possible for a live wire to do better than an even break, and we are coming to the conclusion that the small-town manager is more apt to be a live wire than the man in the city; certainly some of the best schemes submitted to this department come from men whose houses could almost be carried away in a shawl strap if the police did not object. In a city there is a certain assurance of trade if the house is well placed, but in the towns the manager has to go out and get his trade and some of them—a lot of them, in fact, do it in a manner that would shame some of the bigger men.

By All Means.

By all means work the features when you can get them right, and work them for all they are worth. It is not possible to definitely reply to questions of prices since these differ with the different localities, grades of release and even with the different owners of the State rights, but as a general thing the older the special subject the lower the price until eventually it comes within the reach even of the smallest exhibitors with a little enterprise and nerve. Just the other day a house out in the suburbs brought down the Milano "Inferno" for a day and made a clean-up in a locality not much more populous than the town from which this inquiry comes. Brooklyn is a pretty big place, but it is cut up into sections about the size of small towns, each with its main street, its residential sections and all the rest. The house never could have afforded the "Inferno" at the time it was put out, but now the film is not in such demand, the owners of the rights have realized their profit and the price has come down.

We think that some of the special releases such as the "Inferno" should become as standard as some of the dramatic plays that are sent over the circuits, year after year, but neither audience nor exhibitor has been trained to the idea yet and so age rather than worth still determines rental value. In a small town of 3,500 where the special has not yet been seen, the subject is still as fresh as to-morrow's first run, but since tradition runs to the contrary the small manager who waits can have the same attractions as the cities at a price within his reach.

Some Tips on Handling.

Where a special has been out some time, we think it will be worth the time and carfare of the exhibitor if he wi'l make a point of seeing the subject before he books it. Then if a suitable interval elapses between booking and showing, it is possible to do plenty of intelligent presswork. One reason that the special does not always make a proper return in profit is that the exhibitor books on the title and presswork and either gets something that is not suitable for his particular clientele or getting something right, does not know enough about the reels to give the proper booming—and it must be remembered that sometimes overbooming is more damaging than too faint praise. Know, through personal viewing, precisely what you will have. Then you can tell your patrons exactly what you offer and tell them in a way that will convince them that you know what you are talking about. Glittering generalities are all right in their way, but the straightforward talk that is based on personal knowledge of the subject is far more apt to draw the solid people into your house. If a man asks you how the coming feature really is, and you have to hem and haw or confess that you have no more real knowledge than he possesses; that you booked it on press work and hearsay, he is not likely to have great confidence in your judgment. If you can speak positively of your own knowledge it will be worth while. If you can talk in public, get up each show and tell them about it. Talk simply and convincingly. Do not pile on the agony and the adjectives, but tell what you know in a way that will make them realize that you mean what you are saying.

Once More, Paper.

Get plenty of paper and get it somewhere outside your house. The man who goes into town each morning may not pass your house, but if you have a bill in the window of the corner grocery where he stands while waiting for the car he'll know what you are going to have and may come to know your house better through knowing your attractions. Lobby paper is valuable, but the time has come when lobby paper and slides are not in themselves sufficient. You want to reach the man who does not pass your house, who does not see your screen nightly. You're pretty certain of the man who is already in the house, you're reasonably certain to reach the man who comes past your house twice a day as he passes to and from work. The man you most need to get after now is the man who lives a couple of blocks away and who may not pass your house once a month. Take care that there is plenty of "Coming" paper in the lobby and that your screen talks to the people in the house, but get the man around the corner. Build up your business. Work all good locations within six or eight blocks of your house or halfway to the next theater if the stands are more widely separated.

This special paper is particularly important in the case of multiple reel releases, but paper should be used in any event. The newspapers should be used, as well, a more generous space than usual being taken, and an eye-catching cut should be used wherever possible. Hammer away in every legitimate fashion and you'll not only make money but you'll make lasting business.

In connection with what we have written we refer the inquirer to the issues of March 2, 9, 14, 23, 1912, for a series of articles on the special release, to the department of February 3, 1913, for a supplemental article and to that dated December 14, 1912, for a scheme for ensuring a profit on the specials before the reels are brought into the house.

A Kalem Achievement.

One of the prettiest special posters that we've seen is the new Kalem sheet of Miss Alice Joyce. This is tinted rather than colored and makes a rarely effective poster. We have not been advised as to the prices asked for the sheet, but presume that details will be carried in their advertising. They are cheap at any price in reason.

We do not think that the last Kalendar conveys an adequate suggestion of the Kraus Company's pictures of its special releases. They are announced as "plate pictures," which is a rather vague definition. They are actual photographs on smooth finish bromide paper made direct from photographic negatives and not from half tone plates. We have seen a couple of the sets and they are good. The Kraus Company has been working on this scheme ever since we took the matter up with them last Fall in response to the requests of several exhibitors who wanted to make lobby display of photographs to supplement the posters. The Kalem series are issued in sets of twelve for each special release. The Lubin specials carry smaller sets until the more recent productions get along, as the Lubin Company has not been in the habit of making twelve still pictures of each subject.

Guess at the Makes.

The Saenger theater, Shreeveport, La., offers something novel in a straight guessing contest. It offers five theater tickets to the person who can guess the brands of the three reels to be exhibited on Friday evening; the guesses to be in not later than Wednesday night. Of course most of those who have guessed will be around to see if they win, and that makes for good business on a night usually the worst of the week.

Another good scheme is found on the new front page of their weekly program, which serves the Saenger and Palace theaters. It is taken from the programs of the larger cities where the idea has been found very popular, the scheme being similar to various "memory" books. At the bottom of the page is printed:

> MEMORIES OF A PLEASANT EVENING
> A great many people like to keep a souvenir or reminder of a particularly enjoyable evening. Here is space to jot down a few little aids to pleasant memories of
> Day .... Date ...., 1913

Saw the Pictures With	Friends I Saw—
....	....
....	....
....	....
....	....

It would be better yet to run a line for each day of the week and suggest that the patrons come more than once. The idea is susceptible of many variations.

Keeping Going.

The Isis News, Trinidad, Colorado, announces the sale of the house to J. P. Nash, a local newspaper man, and we look to see the sheet better than ever. They get a couple more advertisements each week and yet manage to keep going with plenty about the pictures as well as local news and bright paragraphs. They are printing coupons good for the admission of one child on Saturday afternoon, teaching the young idea to shoot in the direction of the Isis.

A novelty is the frank admission that a certain feature did not do as well as was expected or, indeed, as it deserved, but the editor comforts himself with the belief that it made an impression with those who appreciate the really good in pictures.

Dignified and Intelligent.

Charles W. Kennedy, of the Casino, Coaticook, Canada, sends in a very attractive leaflet for Pickwick Papers. The opening and closing paragraphs should interest other exhibitors. They run:

> You are cordially invited to attend a representation of Dicken's "Pickwick Papers," on Thursday and Friday evenings at the Casino. For the benefit of patrons of high grade pictures, I am reserving one hundred seats for these nights, now on sale at Main Street > Pharmacy at fifteen cents. This will assure comfortable seating without extra cost.

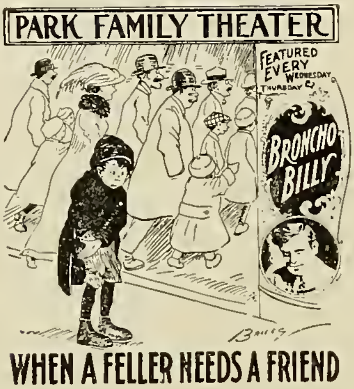
> This feature was shown for the first time in New York last Friday and is in perfect condition. With it we are showing four other interesting films. I personally guarantee the quality of this picture, and assure you it is one you cannot afford to miss.

The reference to the New York showing of the subject is much better than saying that it is first run, first time in town or any other of the usual lines. Mr. Kennedy uses fine paper, selects his type with care and displays it to advantage, an advertisement altogether in keeping with the grade of the subject.

Has It "Soft."

W. J. Bittner, of the Park Theater, Johnstown, Pa., sends in a mat of a single column cut with a five inch reading notice and explains that the cost of the cut carries the reader. As the cut only costs about 65 cents a paper, it looks as though advertising should pay. The cut is a single column reduction of an Essanay advertising cartoon.

Many managers do not follow up their advertising with press matter and a few go to the other extreme and ask for more than they are entitled to in a way that gets them less than really is coming to them. It pays to get on the right side of the business office and stay there. Carry yourself so that they are always glad to see you and leave before they hope you'll go soon. Don't get the idea you can buy the entire plant with a drink or a cigar, but on the other hand do not be stingy. As a rule the reading notice means more than the advertisement and just how much of a reading notice you get depends very largely upon yourself.



PARK FAMILY THEATER

BRONCHO BILLY
WHEN A FELLER NEEDS A FRIEND

Mr. Bittner shows enterprise in using advertisements of the manufacturers for cut copy. A couple of dollars spent with the local cut maker may save twice as much, though the growing use of matrices by the manufacturers is cutting advertising cost considerably.

Has Its Own Spelling.

Most Pastime theaters are spelled that way, but down in Alexandria, La., the call it the Pass Time. Charles F. Bode, the manager, gets out a four-page weekly, three pages of which are devoted to film stories of the week, while the back page is given to general matter. We borrow this from a recent issue:

> A SIMPLE REMEDY FOR THE "GRUMPS."
> Have you got 'em? They afflict you mostly in the evenings when you sit around the house, with your mind on your affairs of the day.
> What you need is a little mental recreation. You want to forget your business and bothers, and the best way to do so is to pick yourself up and come to the "Pass Time." An hour spent here will just fresh you up wonderfully.
> Bother an old picture show, maybe you say. That's all right. If moving pictures don't interest you, it's probably because you have seen only "bum" ones put on improperly, or else you have formed an idea that they are intended for people inferior. My, but you've lots to learn if such thoughts as these are in your head.
> The kind of moving pictures and the way they are put on at the "Pass Time" are not like others. We will guarantee to make you see this form of amusement in a different way if you will come to our theater.
> Consider just a moment. We offer you over an hour of recreation and entertainment for 10 cents. Perhaps you imagine yourself a spendthrift when you "loosen up" to the extent of a dime. Do you give any thought to the many dimes you spend during the day for little, fleeting indulgence? You don't.
> Well, you are cheating yourself by missing the good shows we are providing, and it's high time you changed up a little. Try the panacea we offer for mental relief—come out tonight. No fixing up necessary to go to the "Pass Time."
> P. S.—Bring your wife along.

Is He Getting Lazy?

We are afraid that S. A. Arnold, of the Lyric Theater, Mena, Ark., is suffering from the hook-worm. Usually he comes in every couple of weeks with some real idea, but it's been longer than that since his last call. This time he sends a vest-pocket card with his name, his house and town on one side and a doggerel verse on the other, a couple of the original verses being changed to suit local matters. This sort of stuff sounds foolish to many people, but it is surprising how these cards are passed from hand to hand, particularly in small towns. The verses may aid others and so they are given here:

I bet on a horse called Elastic
In the stretch I knew he was good
I bet on a horse called Lumber
Lumber could win if he wood
I bet on a horse called Umbrella
Umbrella was only good in the wet
I bet on a horse called Hydrant
And Hydrant is running yet
I bet on a horse called Rabbit
Rabbit won by a hare
I bet on a horse called KREOLA
She always was a good Mayor
I bet on a horse called Dollar
He's good for four quarters I know
So I bet on a horse called LYRIC
He always has a GOOD SHOW
I bet on a horse called Shutters
Shutters was out for a blind
So I bet on a horse called Bustle
And Bustle came in—next to the last.
MORAL—Go to the LYRIC—
It's a safe bet.

It will be some time before Mr. Arnold equals his roaring lion fake, but we hope he gets cured of the hook worm quickly.

Something New.

H. B. Smith, of the Freemont Theater, Melrose, California, has given us a new one. In addition to his usual program, he has had prepared a special program of the dances in Biograph's "Oil and Water." That release was a notable production and of itself will attract more than the usual amount of attention, but the novelty of getting out a special program for the dances is something that will emphasize the feature. The dances, by themselves, would be found acceptable and would add much to the effect, but to give them the dignity of a special folder raises them at once to a higher plane. It is the production of "Oil and Water" in which occurs a series of classical posturings of a merit sufficient to warrant special programing and therefore these dances are regarded as a special feature wholly apart from the interest they hold in the story.

Audiences are acutely sensitive to suggestion. Give them an entertainment in a matter of fact way and they will accept it matter of factly. Give certain features special distinction and, provided those features can make good, they will be accepted at the valuation of the management. The program was an inexpensive item, though it was so well done typographically as to suggest cost, and yet for a dollar or so Mr. Smith more than doubled the value of the subject to him and at the same time increased the enjoyment of his patrons by calling their attention to the fact that the dances were something more than an incidental.

We append the program:

> BLANCHE SWEET as MMLE. GENOVA

We wish that Mr. Smith would send us other matter, for we like his material, but we wish, also, that he would note that the staff of this paper is located in New York and not Chicago. It saves delay to address the home office.

New Guessing Contest.

And here is a new form of guessing contest from the East End Cameraphone theater:

> Several months ago we arranged with about thirty merchants in East Liberty to place cards in their windows or inside of their stores. We change these cards daily, but do not use all of the spaces contracted for each day. Some days you will find about ten windows with our cards in and at other times there may be nearer thirty places of business where we are advertised. Have you noticed them? Count those you see and report the day you saw them. If you guess or count correctly the number of cards we have out on a certain day we will give you a three months' pass.

It would seem that this will be permitted where the usual form of guessing contest is illegal. More than that, it calls attention to the house advertising each day, which is the real merit of the idea.

Last August.

It was last August that the advertisement in the Tenth Street Theater program (Kansas City) had reference to. They have changed the text to a more up-to-date announcement and celebrate the coming of St. Patrick's Day by printing the entire program in green ink. Colored inks are tricky, but they get a very good effect because they use a good grade ink. In the long run it pays to get the right sort of ink, even though the job costs less with an inferior color.

The PHOTOPLAYWRIGHT

Conducted by EPES WINTHROP SARGENT

Be a Quester.

WE would like to see more local photoplaywrights in the Inquest Club. We think the social feature alone is worth the trouble of attending a meeting, but beyond this there is a lot to be learned—no matter how much you may know—by mixing with your fellow workers. There are no fees or dues, and the expense of each meeting is as light as you wish to make it. At the meetings already held the checks have run from 25 cents to $2, according to the hunger and thirst of the juryman, and you can break off almost anywhere between those two sums. You are not asked to give the details of the pictures you have written, nor to divulge any selling secrets you may have. The telling of unsold plots is discouraged, and the discussion is held to produced plots, the plays seen that evening, others and scripts of produced plays. It makes for sociability and a higher grade of work. The juries thus far have been representative, and the man with fifty or a hundred sales to his credit puts on no more airs than the novice with one or two sold. It is real fellowship of kindred spirits, and we want all to come in. This particularly means James Carroll, who has been absent thus far.

Don't Bother Gaumont.

The Gaumont company asks that attention be called to the fact that they do not accept manuscript. All purchase of photoplays is made abroad, where the pictures are made, and sending plays to the American branch simply puts someone to the trouble of firing them back at you.

Once more. Gaumont is not purchasing manuscript and does not want to look at any.

Don't Worry.

An excited reader sends us a clipping from the Magazine Maker in which a writer solemnly warns the photoplay writer to prepare to go to the poorhouse unless he can at once learn to write the talking pictures, which are supplanting the silent drama.

There is no need for fear on this point, as this paper has repeatedly pointed out. The talking picture occupies a field of its own. It will supplant the silent drama about the time His Satanic Majesty develops a fad for ice boat racing on the sulphur lakes.

Out At Last.

T. E. Letrende has kept his promise to get the February-March issue out before April 1st, and promises to get the April issue out in the month it is due in. Arthur Leeds contributes a readable story on the Chicago manufacturers, Pop Hoadley has a sane story on writing plays. A. Van Buren Powell doubles with a story of the photoplay writers' dinner and some good advice, and William Lord Wright and A. R. Kennedy give tips to the novice. It is a readable and helpful issue. We hope that new typesetting machine will enable Mr. Letendre to keep his promise and make it 36 pages after this.

We Are Not Turning, Thank You.

We are not turning grindstones for other people's dull axes and some correspondents whose choppers are out of order will please take due notice.

We received three letters in the mail this morning. One of them hints that lynching is too good for Lawrence McCloskey because he wrote Auntie's Affinity. Another is from William H. Kitchell that remarks that the same play is one of the best of the late Lubins. A third is of like tenor and the film critics speak very highly of the same story. We haven't seen the story yet, but we are wondering if the disgruntled one doesn't happen to have had a comedy turned down by the hereinbeforementioned McCloskey.

We replied to one similar letter the other day and the envelope was returned "not found" by the post office. Evidently some of these axe grinders are afraid to state their real names and addresses.

This department is conducted to give what help it can to the student of photoplays and we grow a little tired of the continual yelping of those who do not sell and want to get square with the indifferent companies.

This goes double for a St. Louis person who says he has it from a Selig director that it is the common practice in that and other studios to steal ideas and return the scripts. He is invited to write and give the name of the editor if he can back up his charge, but we do not believe that he would know a Selig or any other editor if he saw one.

What Kalem Wants.

Here is an extract from a personal letter from the Kalem editor to a contributor whose script did not quite measure up to his usual standard. The recipient passes it along because the general advice is a pretty good reflection of what the Kalem wants and what it can get to go with what it wants.

> Then it begins to drag * * * what we try to avoid above everything else is "going and coming" (the husband left home and has returned). We want ACTION * * * Where our four companies have access to steamboats, schooners, sawmills turpentine camps, tobacco plantations, seacoast locations * * * We wish to state that sooner or later it will be necessary to announce that average scenarios will not be considered. We are not interested in any play which does not have at least one big situation and is full of action throughout. Average scenario writers are not writing these kind. The mail is flooded with trite, conventional things which have not the slightest chance of acceptance. From this situation we wish to assure ourselves where we can safely look for authors who can understand and appreciate the Kalem standard. We much prefer a brief specification for a big situation to a complete scenario full of conventionalities. It is much easier to write the scenario from the situation than to put the situation into a mediocre scenario. These comments are not offered as a criticism of your scenarios. You have usually hit the mark with us by providing the class of situation to which we refer. The most common fault among writers is the literary scenario which is by no means suitable for the ACTION that we require and we wish to emphasize our position that you may fully understand the class of scenarios which will find favor.

Competition Scripts.

Something new in the script writing line is the competition script. We have seen in the last week a letter from an advertising film company (one making film for advertising purposes) in which a would-be writer is informed that the company will pay one hundred dollars for a three reel story along certain lines. According to the writer twelve different authors have been asked to submit scripts, one or more of which will be taken. It looks to us like a pretty poor gamble on the part of the author, even though the company in question will deal fairly with those whose work it reviews. At the same time it cannot get an order without showing a script and cannot purchase the script without getting an order and so it cuts both ways.

Has a Department.

Carl M. Chapin, who is coming ahead as a photoplay writer, is conducting a photoplay department on the Waterbury, Conn., American, getting a couple of columns on the dramatic page. He has made a good start and we know that he'll make a better finish. He's that sort of a man. Here's luck.

Inquest Club.

Owing to the fact that this department is printed in an early form of the paper to leave the late days open for the handling of the news of the moment, it will not always be possible to give notice of the next meeting. If prospective members will send in half a dozen self-addressed postal cards this information will be sent them each week as long as the cards last. They should be sent to this writer personally and not to the paper.

Wright and Thomas.

William Lord Wright and A. W. Thomas both advise us that they will be more or less closely connected with the staff of the clearing house established by the Motion Picture Story Magazine.

Just a Wrinkle.

We do not have much use for a typewriter eraser, not that we write so well but because we make so many mistakes that it is quicker to mark a lot of xxxx and let it go at that, but when we do want one it is in a hurry and typewriter erasers are by nature tricky and elusive.

We got two small screw eyes and put one in the front of the right hand side of the end of the desk and the other at the back. Then we took a piece of fishline, ran it through the eyes, tied one end to the eraser and the other to a weight, leaving the line just long enough to clear the floor when the eraser rests against the front screw eye. Now the eraser is clear of the litter on the desk top, it is always where it is wanted and goes back there the moment we let go of it, the weight being sufficient to draw it back against the screw eye, while the cord is long enough when the weight is drawn up to permit us to use it on any part of the carriage. This beats tying the eraser to the machine as it goes completely out of the way when not actually in use.

Second-Hand Authors.

Are you a second-hand author or a regular one?

By second hand we mean one of those persons who seek to mask an inability to write by having recourse to some person who does revision. For a long time we've been wondering how it was that some of the stuff we saw bore such a strong family resemblance. It was a unique jumble of errors in arrangement and it did not seem possible that authors in all parts of the country could have hit upon the same messy way of getting out a script. It was not in the style of any correspondence school we ever had heard of, for we'll give the schools credit for teaching form if not correct technique. This stuff was in a class by itself. Then came a letter from a correspondent more frank than the others. It carried the explanation that the script had been developed from a story by a man who does the work for $1.75. It is worse than the waste of $1.75 because in addition to the loss of the money there is the loss of opportunity, for the script is gotten out in such a slovenly shape that it must be a mighty good story; a wholly unusual story, to attract the editor.

We do not believe that any person can fully and properly develop the ideas of another, and most assuredly it cannot be done by a competent person short of the price the script would bring in the market. It is our own experience that we can write two original photoplays and perhaps more in the time it takes us to line out the ideas of someone else and train them to travel our way, and at best it is a second hand story. If you cannot do your own work, keep on studying until you can, but don't be a second hand author, and don't expect to gain fame on the brainwork of another. If that other really is a brainworker he cannot afford to bother with you and you cannot afford to bother with the other sort.

Scrap Books.

We have received so many letters from photoplay writers asking that this department be printed on facing pages instead of back to back, so that a single copy may be pasted into a scrap book; that the make-up editor is particularly careful to face the pages unless the exigencies of the moment compel putting the pages back to back. Now comes Frank Howard Clark, of Pittsburgh, who writes:

> I conceived the idea of cutting out of the World each week the Photoplaywright's page and having them bound as a separate volume so that I may have in compact form this information for easy reference and to read over occasionally. I found, however, that to cut out the pages would destroy a goodly part of the margin of the sheet. I got around that by turning up the staples on the back of the book and drawing off the pages until I came to the ones I wanted. In this manner I was able to preserve the margin intact. It was a very easy matter to put on the rest of the pages again and turn down the staples so that the magazine was in as complete and good order as formerly save for the removal of these one or two sheets. It took this writer but two evenings to go back through the Worlds and remove these pages which same date back to Dec. 16, 1911 (then called The Scenario Writer). I then purchased a loose leaf binder for $2.25 and a punch for $1.00 to go with it and I now have my easy reference information file complete. Every week I remove the Photoplaywright pages from the World and put 'em in the binder so that I am always up to date.

There is a much simpler way than this as most librarians can explain to an inquirer. The sheet to be pasted up is cut from the publication as close to the binding edge as is possible without cutting the other pages. The sheet of the scrap book is cut to give an opening an eighth of an inch longer and wider than the type on the page to be pasted. This gives a window through which the back of the printed sheet may be read after the margin of the printed sheet is pasted to the part of the scrap book page not cut away, allowing both sides of the single sheet of be read, one as though it were pasted in the book in the usual manner and the other through the window formed by cutting away the pasting sheet. Glue instead of paste should be used to prevent wrinkling as much as possible.

We use a loose leaf binder of the ring type with a page 9½ by 12 and we have just received from the bindery the book to the end of last year, leaving the binder free for the collection of this year's pages. The cost for binding will be about a dollar to a dollar and a half, with lettering extra.

Where a full page is presented on one side and less on the other, we cut away from the scrap book page only as much as is necessary to show what is to be preserved.

It might be added that one writer, following the loose leaf system, numbers his pages and indexes by subjects, allowing a full page for each topic and adding the page number, all referenced to plot building, for instance, being entered on the "Plot" page by the number of the scrap book page, only. In this way all of the items on one subject may be located quickly.

Even So.

M. D. Stilson, of the Schuyler Opera House, Cobleskill, N. Y., rises to disagree with a recent article by Louis Reeves Harrison in which the statement is made that there are few good plots used because there are few good writers of plots. He thinks that Mr. Harrison bears down too heavily on the amateur writer and thinks that the directors should be jacked up a bit. He cites an instance wherein a picture, supposed to be a night scene, shows a rooster and his hen-harem out for a midnight stroll. He plaintively asks: "Did not that director have any idea as to when a rooster and his wives go to bed?"

The point is well taken and we think that Mr. Harrison has suffered from the producer as we all have, but he overlooks the rather important point that the director didn't have a good script to start with because there are few writing really good scripts yet. We are trying to educate the novice whom Mr. Stilson thinks we are decrying, but we are trying to jolt the novice out of his complacent belief that if he has written the script it must be good. We are trying to make all writers see that a script must be above the ordinary, that they must think harder and to better effect.

Mr. Harrison was not hammering the novice, but in his own way he was trying to point out that there is a demand for really good stuff that is not being filled and some of the best story writers, it may be added, are trying to fill that demand and are failing as badly as some of the novices. The man who never wrote a short story in his life may be able to write a better photoplay than the fiction star, but before he does he must have it driven home that anything he puts down on a piece of white paper in approved photoplay style is not, for that reason, a photoplay. We are trying to make him see that it must be something more than incident, something more than action. It must have a heart and soul. It must be real.

It takes three weeks to learn to run a trolley car and yet many writers complain because they do not sell their first hurriedly written script and talk about the screened story being so immeasurably inferior to their own product of genius. This doesn't mean Mr. Stilson, but he started off the comment and we are winding it up for the benefit of those who need it.

"The Director's Sheet."

Several persons have written lately to know what is on the director's sheet. We are afraid we shall have to confess ignorance. Most directors work from the script or write one of their own when the rearrangement of scenes is extensive or when the script runs too full and the business is buried in a mass of petty detail, but we know only one company that invariably has a special script made for the producer.

One letter seems to suggest that the "director's sheet" is the first page of the script, giving the cast, synopsis and scene plot. The latter is valuable only when it is reasonably certain that the play will be put on as written, but the cast and synopsis are invariably required, and the synopsis should be single spaced and within 250 words. If some of these inquirers will be more specific we'll try and be more educational.

Hardened to Rejections.

Only the other day a chap told us he was getting hardened to rejection slips and he "didn't let them worry him" any more. There is no reason why a rejection slip should be regarded as something unpleasant other than that it is a notification that a check may not be expected from the house making the rejection. It is not necessarily the sign of a poor story. The best writers get slips or letters and they know that not available means just that and not necessarily "not meritorious." Of course, a slip may mean that the story is too bad to be filmed, but it does not always mean that and sometimes the man or woman who weeps over a rejection would be surprised could the real reason be known. It may mean that the editor has a headache, that the director has a grouch, that they just took a story along the same lines or that they have decided to stop making that sort of story for the present. When you get a rejection slip and the story looks pretty good to you still, smile and send it along to the next and the next. If it doesn't look right, fix it up and send along again, but don't feel broken up for a week just because a slip came in.

Inquiries.

NOTE—Replies cannot be sent by mail. State name of character. Do not ask for "leads" or "that man." Addresses cannot be given here, but a list of studio addresses will be sent for a stamped and self-addressed envelope. Only questions of general interest will be answered. Replies cannot be repeated.

B. T. I.—We do not know why Essanay has not released the pictures you mention. You do not stand much chance of placing special scripts. Most of these are written by some person familiar with the wants. We believe that Mr. Anderson himself writes the Broncho Billy stories. The Projection Department appeals to a wider circle of readers, and so gets more space. There is no film we know of that will give positive pictures without the use of negative. The old-fashioned tintypes and the Lumiere color plates give direct positives, but through reflection. There is no demand for such a film, though it would be handy for the local exhibitor who has a motion camera. We do not locate that Bison by your title.

X. Y. Z.—Any company working in New York or Chicago could get the use of a steamer, but we do not believe that any would care to go to the trouble and expense your story would involve.

J. M.—No private is cast as lead in Broncho's "In the Ranks." Sergeant Allen, or Simmons, was E. H. Allen. He is called Allen in the synopsis and Simmons in the film. James Young Deer is still in charge of the Western Pathe studio. We do not know about the other players you mention.

V. M. K.—The Photoplaywright department was started under the title of "The Scenario Writer," in the issue of December 16, 1911. Not all back numbers are available, but you can get the bound volumes (three months each), for $1.50 per volume. Some libraries file this publication, but not all. If your library does not, perhaps a chat with the librarian will result in its being added to the list of perodicals.

B. T. F.—If you desire us to take the matter up, send the name of the script.

MARIE—The name and address is requisite in asking questions. In "The War Correspondent," Jack, was Harry Millarde, and Myrtle, Miss Marguerite Courtot. In "The Spanish Parrot Girl" Harold Lockwood was Avery, and Miss Amy Trask was Lola. You can obtain the names of the characters when not given in the film from the Stories of the Film.

L. L.—In "Seeing is Believing," Charles Hitchcock was the butler. In "From the Submerged," E. H. Calvert was the doctor. We have not heard that Mr. Bushman was to join Vitagraph.

W. E. W.—The wife in "Look Not Upon the Wine," was Miss Kate Toncray. The girl in "A Queer Elopement," was Miss Grace Lewis. We lack the third cast. "Harry Benson," of the English postcards, is Charles West.

J. H. M.—No accurate list of the managers of photoplay theaters is available.

W. E. W.—If you'll read this paper carefully you'll notice that Biograph is working in Los Angeles, and Miss Pickford in New York. That answers the question as to whether she works occasionally for the Biograph now. They are releasing pictures in which she appears because they have some made while she was with them and not yet released. How can we tell if Mr. Belasco has any financial interest in the Biograph? No such announcement has been made.

L. A. C.—We lack the cast you ask for. See just above.

E. M. C.—"Technique of the Photoplay" will tell you all you need to know. If you know the pictures well it should come easy to you, though it is by no means as easy as it looks. Plays should be addressed simply to the company or "Photoplay Editor" of the company. Thanks for the poem. And it's seldom we say thanks for poetry.

Eau Claire—The name of your city is not regarded as sufficient signature. Read the rules.

MARIE—William Garwood had the title in "Her Fireman." Miss Marguerite NeMoyer was Ruth in "Will Willie Win?" Darwin Karr is the Solax player you ask about.

G. A.—Miss Edna Payne and Earle Fox are the people you think should be praised.

JONES—The author is supposed to write in his own leaders. They are written in the action between the scenes or in the scene as may be necessary. You also write all letters, newspaper clippings or headings and anything else inserted in the film. Pathe is the only company we know that asks for the author's name on a separate sheet. It is an unusual rule, due to some peculiarity of method. The safest plan in general is to put your name and address in full on every sheet.

A Triumph for the Projection Department.

For a long time this department has, and its editor has through his handbooks, been insisting upon the introduction of a little common sense into the laws governing operating room construction and equipment. We have, from time to time, told some good, hard, but rather unpalatable truths regarding the asininity and utter idiocy displayed by our lawmakers in these matters.

At last, even right here in New York State where the lawmakers, as a rule, are hide-bound and about as progressive as an Egyptian obelisk, a measure has been introduced into the Assembly in Albany which to a large extent incorporates every one of the provisions we have demanded. Whereas, the former-law stipulated asbestos board on an iron frame, the new law says: "Concrete, brick, hollow tile, or other approved fireproof material, or other approved fireproof framework covered or lined with asbestos board, or with some other approved fire-resisting material." The new law also requires a vent flue, of not less than 50 sq. inches cross-section, except on strictly portable booths, which, by the way, is only about one-fourth large enough, but is considerably better than nothing at all and a step in the right direction. One provision of the law, however, is very bad. It reads: "When the booth is in use there shall be a constant current of air passing outward through said opening or vent flue at the rate of not less than 30 cu. ft. per minute." This, of course, presumes the installation of a fan in the flue, and that, as we have repeatedly pointed out, is bad for several reasons. Moreover, such a current of air would be impractical in cold weather. So interested is the editor of this department in this matter that if a public hearing is held on the proposed bill he will journey to Albany to argue for the enlargement of the vent flue, the omission of the 30-foot proposition and the inclusion of certain other essential details. We must, however, in closing, say that the observation port is not restricted in size except by the words: "shall be no larger than reasonably necessary," which is good. If the law is passed we will print it in full.

25 Cent Moving Picture Theater in Brooklyn.

At Third Avenue and 75th Street, Brooklyn, is the house recently erected and opened by Herman Mayer (Chas. Klein, manager), who also owns the Electra, 1160 Broadway; Colonial, 1746 Broadway; Colonial Airdrome, Rockaway Avenue and Chauncey Street, General Manager, Otto Lederer.

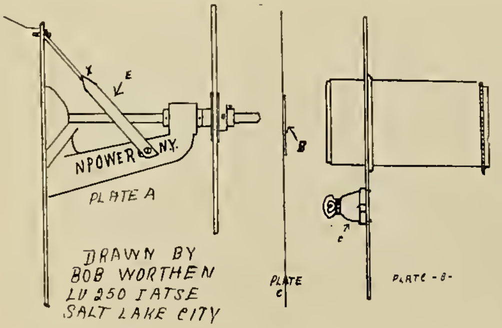
The new house seats 700 on its main floor and spacious balcony. It is indeed a beautiful theater, both inside and out, reflecting credit not only upon its owner and its manager, but on the business as a whole. There is one feature, however, which I particularly, and as forcibly as may be, desire to call attention to, viz: the fact that the entire main floor carries a ten-cent admission, while the balcony is fifteen and twenty-five cents. This house is doing a splendid business, notwithstanding the fact that absolutely nothing is on the program but moving pictures. The night I visited the house, at the invitation of the management, was an "off" night (Friday) and threatening rain also, yet the main floor and balcony were both full almost to capacity at ten, fifteen and twenty-five cents admission.

What is the answer, you ask? Exactly what I have been telling you for three years. Careful attention to details, a good orchestra rehearsed to play the pictures to the limit and good projection. The operating room walls and ceiling are of concrete, about 8 x 20 feet, by probably 7½ feet high. The rewinding and motor-generator rooms (there is a room for both) open off this. There is an ample vent flue through the roof. The room is, in fact, one which has my hearty approval in every detail. The equipment consists of two Power's Six A machines, to which current is supplied by a Wagner rotary converter. The operating room is in charge of operator F. Eichhorn. The screen is plain, white plaster concaved. The pictures were brilliant and were, in the main, run at correct speed. In other words, the projection was high class. The seven-piece orchestra handled the musical end splendidly and the combined result was a house full at ten, fifteen and twenty-five cents admission. I wish we had more houses like this one and more owners and managers like Messrs. Mayer and Klein.

Power's 6 Shutter Bracket Brace and Framing Lamp.

Mr. Bob Worthen, Liberty Theater, Salt Lake City, Utah, writes:

> Noticed in a recent issue one of the boys was having trouble with a Power's "Six" shutter being out of time. Had the same difficulty with one of my machines. It was impossible to eliminate travel ghost until I located the trouble. Found the screw (732, Fig. 118, page 278 of the handbook) holding shutter bracket had become worn and allowed some play in the arm, which was most noticeable when running fast. I tried putting a washer in the screw, without effect, and, regardless of anything I could do, the trouble continued until I fixed it as shown in sketch; first, however, installing a new shutter gear (635, Fig. 118, page 278 of the handbook). Brace E is made from the blade of a knife switch, which was twisted as shown at X. The brace stopped the trouble. The upper front plate screw served to hold the upper nut of the brace. This brace holds the shutter bracket perfectly rigid, and with the play taken out of gears and shaft, and the shutter straightened up and set, the machine runs like a 21-jewel watch. I also include sketch of a small battery flash lamp which I installed on the inner side of the front plate for threading in frame, connecting same to three No. 6 dry cells, with small switch located on the machine baseboard. "B" on plate C shows the relation of aperture plate to lamp.



Many thanks for your contribution, brother Worthen. You certainly are some draughtsman. Yours is perhaps as good a drawing as I have ever had submitted, only I had to trace it over in India ink, since you made it in lead pencil. Did you have screw 733, Fig. 119 page 280 of the handbook, set up tight? That helps hold the shutter bracket, too, you know; but it is overlooked by a great many operators in setting up their machines.

Houma Answered Again.

Mr. Harry E. Collins, Topeka, Kas., writes:

> I think Houma, La., February 22d issue, should examine his star and cam and reset them, if necessary, so that there will be no lost motion. I have noticed this fault also when using first-run films, due to the collecting of emulsion on the tension springs. Also the tension springs should be set perfectly square with the aperture plate tracks. Projection is very good in this city. We use a cored lower carbon here. I have used a hard carbon below in other cities, but some way it does not seem to work out right here. We have 110 volts d. c. through a coil rheostat drawing about 32 amperes. With hard carbons below the light is very unsteady. That school idea of the Salt Lake Union is a good stunt. I thoroughly agree that the union slide should not be shown unless it be followed by good projection. The operating rooms here are not up to date, though the houses otherwise are very good. We have nine moving picture theaters, every one of them employing members of Local 206, I. A. T. S. E. We receive $18 for six days, working seven hours per day; no Sunday shows. The local will give its annual ball March 17th.

If you think the Salt Lake scheme is a good one, why not emulate it in Topeka? You have nothing to lose and everything to gain by so doing. As to the carbon matter, you say "hard" carbons. If you really mean hard carbons, then you do not mean the same thing I do. Solid carbons come in many degrees of hardness. You should have a soft solid carbon; in other words, a projection carbon, and not a street light carbon.

Unsatisfactory Shipment.

Mr. L. J. Wittman, president of the Star Amusement Company, Hamilton, Ohio, writes:

> You should inform the Stern Mfg. Company that their reels should be shipped K. D., as they arrive badly bent when sent through the parcels post; also the screws they sent are too large, and the hub is very hard wood. The Moving Picture World is my bible, and I simply cannot get along without it. I save every copy, and believe I have one of its very first issue. I met the late Mr. J. P. Chalmers at Dayton, Ohio. He took a snap at a group of the boys with his ever-ready kodak about fifteen minutes before the accident which resulted in his untimely taking away. I feel that the moving picture industry does not, and never can, realize the great power J. P. Chalmers exerted for the good of the business. I am more than glad to see that his departure for the Other Shore has caused no material change in the policy and management of the paper. I am not a subscriber, since I get the paper every week from a newsdealer who is one of my regular patrons, thus killing two birds with one stone.

I have written the Stern Mfg. Company, who will no doubt take cognizance of the complaint and remedy whatever is wrong. Needless to say, we thoroughly agree with you in your remarks concerning Mr. Chalmers. The policy established by him in the conduct of the paper has only been modified where changing conditions have made it necessary.

Sample of Oil.

North Yakima, Wash., writes, ordering a handbook and torch. His letter reads as follows:

> I would not be without the M. P. World under any consideration. We use licensed films, 30 to 60 days old. I have a motor-driven machine and motor-driven rewind. The operators here have only been organized since July. Projection is better than the average, but there is only one theatre, the Dream, running straight pictures; three others use vaudeville and pictures. I had the same trouble Homa, La., had, viz., objects in the picture quivering. After trying many things I discovered that the cam shaft was worn on the flywheel side; also the boxing in framing carriage on the same side was worn so badly that it caused a vibration which was noticeable only on the screen. Secured a new framing carriage and cam shaft and all was lovely again. Am sending a sample of oil. What do you think of it?

What I might "think of it" would not prove anything, one way or the other. The only way to determine the quality of the oil is to have it analyzed, or else give it a practical test, and I have neither the time nor the opportunity to do that. The oil seems to have very good lubricating qualities, but I imagine it would gum pretty badly. Many thanks for your explanation of Homa's trouble. It is passed along to the Louisiana brother to try out. I trust that the new organization will succeed.

Resistance Question.

Mr. Wm. Moore, Philadelphia, Pa., asks:

> Is there any fixed rule for finding the number of amperes from a certain number of volts, so as to get a good light for a certain throw? Example: Suppose we have 220 volts a. c., with a throw of 90 feet. What would I have to have to get a good light? Are there any good, reliable operating schools in New York where one can learn?

Plainly Philadelphia's knowledge is exceedingly limited. I would suggest that he serve an apprenticeship under a competent operator, at the same time studying the handbook diligently, since therein he will find all his questions answered. For his benefit I will say that the voltage, so far as his light is concerned, is a fixed quantity, approximately 35 for a. c. and 48 for d. c., that being the voltage across the arc. The resistance reduces the line voltage to that value.

Putting Out Fire.

> Should a film ignite and the fire get into the magazine, would the New York Board of Fire Underwriters expect the operator to put the fire out, or let it burn? What would be the safest method of extinguishing such a fire?

If the fire gets into the magazine it does not make any particular difference what the New York Board of Fire Underwriters may expect; you will probably be exceedingly busy getting out. Ordinary wheat flour, such as bread is made from, is the most effective agent I know of for smothering a film fire. If you could get the magazine off the machine, lay it on the floor and dump a sack of flour over it, the fire would go out; but you cannot do that, so what is the use in talking? If fire gets into the magazine it will consume the film therein; you can gamble on that. The thing to do is have your port shutters so arranged that they will drop instantly, and have a large vent pipe extending to the outer air; then if a fire occurs, just grab the film box containing the extra reels, get out of the operating room, close the door and let her burn. That is my advice. But if you are right there on the job, and keep your wits about you, fire will never get into the magazine in the first place, even though the film ignites at the aperture.

Editor Slapped on the Wrist.

Mr. S. W. Andrews, of the Sterling Novelty Company, writes:

> The issue (March 1st) containing your answer to my letter of January 24th has just reached me. Do not think because you have given your opinion on this situation that I deem it sufficient reason to disclaim future friendship. I do, however, think that, in full justice to myself you should have published my letter as it was written, as the extra space necessary to do so would have been very little. In a couple of instances you make it appear that I have said things which in reality I did not say. Your statement that says "It is dishonest and pernicious" looks as though I was trying to rub it into the concerns which may be making parts in imitation of the original. Being in business myself, is is not for me to say whether this is dishonest or not, as we must all endeavor to make a living in this great struggle for existence. In another instance you make me say, "Of course their prime object is to shut off the sale of dupe parts, and with that we have no quarrel," which makes it appear as though I had a quarrel with the Power's company. The purport of my letter was as to whether or not exhibitors should be allowed to purchase, upon its merit, any article offered for sale, provided it is legally right for them to do so. This does not necessarily mean articles offered for sale by the Sterling Novelty Company. I feel that, in full justice to all concerned, you should publish this letter, together with my letter of January 24th, exactly as they are written.

I appreciate your having taken my remarks in good part, brother Andrews. I think, however, that no one misunderstood your meaning as set forth in the article complained of. Your letter was very long, and I am absolutely compelled to economize space by eliminating all superfluities. As it is now, I am simply swamped with matter. Your request as to the publication of your present letter is complied with, but I think no good purpose would be served by publishing the other communication. No one thinks you have any quarrel with the Nicholas Power Company. As to the "dishonest and pernicious" part, I simply changed the wording, but not the apparent meaning of your former letter. I never intentionally alter the meaning of a letter, or any part of it. I do not think, friend Andrews, you object to rubbing it in to those who make parts in exact imitation of machine parts and sell them as the original; that is the "dishonest and pernicious" referred to.

Light Outfit.

Mr. A. J. Wellman, Scenic Theater, Ironton, Ohio, writes:

> Possibly what I have to say may be of value to brother exhibitors. I recently installed a direct-connected electric light outfit built by the Heer Engine Company of Portsmouth, Ohio. The engine is of the two-cylinder opposed type, 10 h. p., with a Triumph 5-k. w., 110-volt, d. c. generator. My average load is from 45 to 55 amperes. I project a 22-foot picture at 90 feet. Use ¾-inch cored carbons on top, and ⅝ cored below, which gives a most desirable steady white light, with the arc consuming about 25 to 30 amperes, at a total cost of about ¾ cent per k. w., or about $6 per month, using natural gas at 25 cents per thousand. The plant is giving no trouble and has been running about a month. It requires very little attention. I find the Projection Department to be of untold value.

We are very much obliged to brother Wellman for the description of his plant. I think he holds the record in cost of current production, if his figures are accurate. Three-quarters of a cent per k. w. will make some of the brother exhibitors turn a bright grass green with envy.

Intermittent Trouble.

Cedar Rapids, Iowa, writes:

> I am operating Power's Six which has stood some pretty hard knocks. Power's machine is noted for its steady pictures and silent operation, but this one, while it projects a fairly steady picture when running slow, produces a very heavy clicking sound and the picture jumps pretty badly when speeded up. Have set my tension springs several times but without effect. There is no unnecessary lost motion in the intermittent but the intermittent sprocket is badly worn.

I think, Cedar Rapids, that your Geneva movement is badly worn. Your machine should be sent to the factory for repairs. Remember that the intermittent acts approximately 960 times per minute, and cannot be expected to last forever. A badly worn intermittent sprocket should not be tolerated; it is exceedingly hard on the films. Send your machine to the factory for repairs is my advice.

Fire Proof Walls.

Mr. L. C. Morgan, Prineville, Ore., writes:

> Have your new handbook and have already found valuable use for it. Am remodeling my theater. It is impractical for me to use brick, tile or cement for my operating room. I have therefore planned to use ⅜ asbestos millboard and cover the same with galvanized iron. Would you consider the millboard as sufficient without the iron, or would you use the iron as I have planned?

I would build that kind of a room as follows if it were my own house: First build a wooden frame of 2 x 4 inch or 2 x 6 inch studding, or with good, heavy floor joist, just the same as if you were going to board it up. Next, with sheet asbestos 3 inches wide by ⅜ inch thick face all the studding so that the millboard will not come directly in contact with the wood, and so that all seams will come over the sheet asbestos. Now put on your inside lining of millboard and finish the outside any way you want to, not forgetting a vent flue of not less than 288 square inches in area. Such a room will be, if carefully constructed, thoroughly fireproof. The face of the studding will be protected and there will be a dead air space of not less than four inches between the inner and outer walls, ceiling and floor.

Power's 6 Toggle Gear.

Mr. Frank Phythyon, Clymer, Pa., says the toggle gear on his Power's "Six" is tight when the framing carriage is central. In this connection I would refer him to Instruction No. 24, page 275 of the handbook. I think that will cover his difficulty. Brother Phythyon also complains of the poor patches which most operators make, and most certainly his complaint is justified by the facts. Maybe some day operators will learn to make a patch right. I most sincerely hope so, anyhow.

Knows Three Dandy Towns.

Mr. C. F. Lubiens, Odanah, Wis., writes:

> We have a fine theater, seating 500. Have our own light plant, consisting of a 15 h. p. Detroit gas engine, and an old type Edison generator, which is not satisfactory. We therefore purpose to install a 10 k. w. dynamo, which we think will be much more economical and satisfactory in every way. Our service is from the General Film Company, Minneapolis, and although we are running 60 to 120-day service, the films are in fine condition. I think when one gets good service a word of commendation should be given, the same as censure is given when the condition is the opposite. "Jimmy the Usher" is very much in evidence all over the country, and I think laws tending to eliminate him are good laws, indeed. I shall be very glad to correspond with any operator who feels like writing. Am located on the Bad River Indian Reservation, and will say that we have very fine audiences, who thoroughly appreciate the pictures we show. I know of at least three dandy towns in need of moving picture shows. Anyone wishing to locate in good live places can learn of them by writing me, enclosing stamp for reply.

I do not know, brother Lubiens, but I think you will get a few letters on that "dandy town" proposition—possibly quite a few. It is indeed the duty of the exhibitor and operator to commend good film service, as well as to censure that which is not good. As a rule, however, this is forgotten. The censure is forthcoming quickly enough, but the word of praise is omitted entirely, no matter how much it is deserved. In this connection I might say that I believe the General Film Company is doing a great and meritorious work in remedying some of the many evils present in practically all film exchanges. Notably is this true in the matter of inspection and repair of films. One of the exceedingly serious things the business has been confronted with has been the wretched condition in which some of the film exchanges send out their reels. The General Film Company seems to be making a real and effective effort to overcome this, and that company is certainly to be highly commended for so doing.

Roll It Around.

Mr. J. A. Williamson, Kansas City, Mo., fires the following wad in our direction:

> Why does the spot appear round on the outside shutter, while on the screen it is oblong? Kindly roll this around a while and see if it will accumulate an answer.

In the first place, brother Williamson, I have yet to see the spot on an outside shutter which appears round. Possibly some of them do, but I think I will pass this up to the department fans and let them do the rolling.

Rainbow.

Washburne, Me., writes:

> What causes rainbow to appear in my picture? The predominant color is green. It is sometimes in the center of the picture, and at other times anywhere it takes a notion. Have tried setting the carbons different ways, but Mr. Rainbow is still on the job. Also I want to know which gives the better picture, with the least amount of flicker, a two-wing or a three-wing Power's shutter; 110-volt, 60-cycle a. c.

Inasmuch as Washburne, Me., orders a handbook, which he doubtless has by now, I think a study of carbon setting therein will answer his first query. The Power's "Six" shutter question has been answered time and again. With a two-wing shutter you will get more light—and more flicker, but the three-wing shutter gets into synchronism with the alternations of the current if you speed up beyond 65 to 70, thus producing a flashing of the light.

A Good Operator.

Mr. J. Reney, Brandon, Manitoba, Canada, writes:

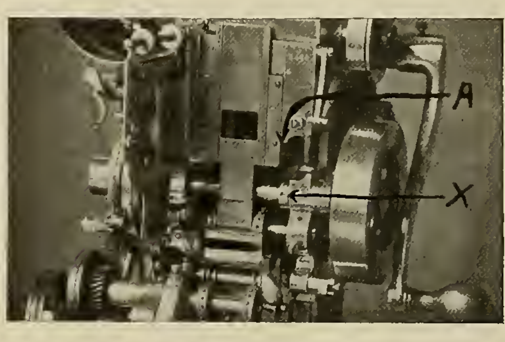
> I do not think the best operator is always to be found in the large city, or else I do not understand very well the meaning of the term "good operator." I am sending some misframes cut from films that have been run by some of the best houses in Winnipeg. There is no doubt about that, as I have seen these films advertised in the Winnipeg local papers some times a week or two before I had same. Now, I do not see how a "good operator" could stand to run fourteen to fifteen shows a day with misframes in his film, or with some of the patches I have found, samples of which are also enclosed. I am compelled to spend fully two hours to put my four-reel program in good shape, though the films are under thirty days from release date. I would like to say, not for the benefit of operators, but for the information of managers who have little practical knowledge, yet who insist that their operator use two ⅝ cored carbons with 30 to 35 amperes d.c., I have tried that plan with several brands of carbons, but the best results were had with the regular set and kind of carbons always advertised for d.c. I was pleased with your first handbook, but the second beats them all. If operators would keep the idlers of their magazines a little bit cleaner we would not have so many scratched films.

The term "good operator" is easy to define. It means the man who puts perfect results on the screen; whose field is always (not sometimes) brilliant and entirely free from shadow; whose picture contains no jump or vibration, except that due to imperfection in perforation in the film itself, and who watches and regulates the speed of his projector in such manner as to bring out the very best, most natural and most effective action in the figures on the screen. Certainly the good operators are not confined to the cities. Right here in New York, while we have some good projection, we also have a great deal that is utterly vile, and the same thing is true, according to all reports, of Chicago and most other cities. The fact that you saw film advertised as being run in Winnipeg is no proof that your particular reels were there. You must remember that your exchange may have bought two or three copies of these films, and the particular ones you have may never have seen Winnipeg, though, of course, they may have, too. As to the carbon matter, I do not know what you mean by "regular set and kind of carbons always advertised for d.c." You will have to explain that a little more fully. It is indeed too bad that your exchange will send out films in the condition shown by the samples submitted. One of the patches shown is a new variety to the editor. The film has been cut and put together at the dividing line, and then a piece of a film a little more than ¼ inch wide has been pasted over the joint. This does not make a good job, since the patch is very stiff. The misframes complained of are the fault of the printing machine. I have sent them to the Universal people.

A Good Scheme—I Guess.

Brother Blaine Day, Sherman, Texas, contributes the following idea, which I think may be of decided value. He writes:

> As you well know, the Power's Six develops end motion in the fly-wheel shaft rather rapidly, and this has a tendency to set up trouble in the toggle gear. Had a machine that did not run right and it worried me continually. Had excessive end motion in the fly-wheel shaft. To overcome this I took the mechanism to a machine shop, removed the fly-wheel shaft and had a collar put on just inside and up against the right hand bushing. When end motion develops through wear, all I have to do now is to loosen the set screw of the collar, slip it over a little and, presto, chango! brother End Motion is gone. The location of the collar is plainly shown at X in the picture. Before putting the collar on it will be necessary to file away a little of the frame as shown at A in the picture, in order to make room for the collar. This does not in any way injure the machine.



The only question which arises in my mind in connection with this scheme is this: a collar would have the effect of shifting the cam or fly-wheel shaft over to the left as the wear takes place. Now, the further the cam shaft is shifted over the less bearing the geneva pins will have on the cam ring. Whether the wear would be sufficient, in the course of time, to lessen the cam pin bearing enough to do material damage or not, I would not like to say. Otherwise the scheme is entirely practical and in every way excellent.

Light Trouble.

Wheeling, W. Va., writes:

> I am having trouble with my light. The throw is 93 feet. Am using 7 condensers, Ft. Wayne Compensarc on the 60-ampere notch. Get yellow streaks all around the edges of my picture, also a dark center. Can you tell me how to overcome this trouble?

For the love of Mike, how many times have I got to tell you boys that I cannot answer questions concerning lenses and their proper relation to each other, and to the throw and picture, unless I know both the width of the picture and the throw? Either send me the width of the picture and the throw when asking such a question, or else write the letter and throw it in the waste basket, thus saving postage. Now is that plain enough? If the Wheeling brother is a new reader I can forgive him, but I have said this so very often that it has gotten monotonous. You say you are "using 7 condensers." I suppose you mean 7½ condensers, which most likely is correct in your case. Try moving your lamphouse forward and back, if you have not already done so.

Doesn't Injure His Digestion.

Stoneham, Mass., writes:

> Enclosed find $1 for the torch described February 22d issue. I feel that it is certainly all right when you speak well of it. I received the new handbook and have been eating and sleeping with it ever since. It does not seem to injure my digestion, but it keeps me awake nights some. It certainly is all right.

As for that torch, I thought a few of the boys would send for it, but I did not look for such enthusiastic response. Never again, gentlemen! I have something to do besides wrap up and send out torches. Those ordering this little device must remember that I only recommended it for light work, such as soldering wires, etc.

New York Operators' Ball a Splendid Success.

It is a real pleasure to chronicle a genuine success, no matter what the nature of that success may be, and I therefore wish I could spare space to adequately set forth details of the New York Operators' Ball, which took place in the Amsterdam Opera House, New York City, the night of Easter Sunday. That the affair would be a success seemed assured weeks ago, but I think none of us were quite prepared for the really, genuinely pleasurable evening which awaited those who foregathered in the Amsterdam Opera House last Sunday evening to take part in the Second Annual Ball of Local Union No. 35, I. A. T. S. E.

Many notables were present, among them, Charles Shea, International President of the I. A. T. S. E., and such International Officers of other theatrically affiliated organizations as happened to be in the city. Among the very popular ones present I must not forget to name Wm. Kelley, Billy Munroe and Tom Burke, of Local Union No. 1, New York City, of which Brother Munroe is president. The various machine companies were represented as follows: Nicholas Power Co., Mr. L. W. Atwater, Will C. Smith and Jacob Ornstein; Motiograph by Mr. Fred A. Clarke and Mr. J. E. McAuley; the Simplex by Mr. H. B. Coles, and the Standard by Mr. Erich Morrison. The Moving Picture World was represented by Mr. F. H. Richardson, editor of the Projection Department. Various film notables lent their presence to the occasion, among them Miss Mary Pickford (our Mary), who is now playing a leading role in the "Good Little Devil." Miss Pickford led the grand march in company with Ernest Truxes, also of the "Good Little Devil" company. Next in line of the grand march was International President Charles Shea and wife, followed by J. F. Stephens, President Department No. 1, L. U. 35, and wife; El De Costa, President Department No. 2, and wife; Harry Dignon, Vice-President, Dept. No. 1, and wife; Sidney Dignon, Vice-President Dept. No. 2, and wife; John S. Clarke, Secretary Dept. No. 1, and wife; John R. Gibbs, Sec. Dept. No. 2, and Wife; Gus Durkin, Sec.-Treas. Depts. No. 1 and 2, and wife; F. H. Richardson, Chairman Arrangements Committee, and wife, and the various other officers of the two departments, most of them accompanied by their fraus.

The Amsterdam Opera House Hall is an immense place and it was filled long before midnight, though there was not that overcrowding which made the Exhibitors' Ball rather uncomfortable. The operators took a lesson from what had gone before and secured ample quarters. Altogether the organization will clear more than $2,000 above expenses, and the affair itself is one of which it can be more than proud. Everybody was good natured and bent wholly, solely and entirely on having one rip-roaring good time—and they certainly succeeded.

Home Projector.

Messrs. Caufield and Shook, photographers, Louisville, Ky., write:

> Is there a motion picture projection machine made for home use which uses standard films? If so, where can it be procured?

Yes, there is such a machine. It is made by Mr. C. Francis Jenkins, 1804 Park Road, Washington, D. C. Also there are others, but I have not their addresses at hand.

Oxzone Gas.

New York City asks the following question:

> As I intend to be my own boss in the future, will you kindly give me the benefit of your opinion as to the following: I want to buy a machine with an oxzone gas outfit. Would that kind of illuminant give a fairly good picture, and at what throw would same give best results? Can I use any kind of screen, or is there one on the market that you would recommend for this purpose? Is there, in your opinion, a better substitute for electricity than oxzone? I intend to travel through small towns where there is no picture show, making one-night stands. Would you buy a tent, or would it be practical to show in halls?

My advice to you is to look mighty closely before you leap in such matters as this. "All is not gold that glitters"; also a piece of good glass, backed up by tinfoil, will sparkle just as brightly as the best diamond ever made. This small-town-one-night-stand stunt is the rock upon which many a poor fellow has upset his voyage to riches. You evidently have not had experience in such matters. Unless you have a vast capability for hard work and considerable capital to tide you over the losses which will be inevitable until you have learned the business of exhibiting in small towns, you had better keep out. Oxzone will give you a fairly good 8-foot picture, provided your films are carefully selected and none of them dense. Tank gas is better. A perfectly clean, white muslin screen is the only thing available for your purpose, for several reasons. As I said before, if you only have small capital you had better keep your fingers out of that particular pie, because it is not pie at all, but only a living at best, with a whole lot of good hard work. I do believe, however, that with a properly designed and equipped auto truck outfit money could be made that way, but it would cost several thousand dollars to rig out such an outfit.

The Vaniscope.

Mr. William Crager, Galveston, Texas, writes:

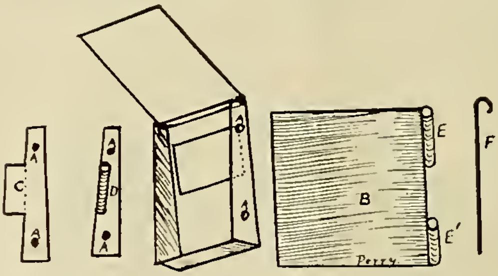
> Attached hereto find a sketch which I hope will help some poor fellow bucking commercial. I notice recently you say you do not know anything about the Vaniscope. I enclose herewith a printed description of the same, which is all I have seen. If you are able to get any more dope on the proposition, please publish it, for you must realize that if you can believe even 50 per cent. of what the enclosed article says this machine bids fair to revolutionize projection. I also attach another clipping, written by someone who calls himself the "goat man." Who is your friend? Probably he uses this non de plume meaning that he is always butting in.

As to the "friend" to whom you refer, I have all I can do to attend to our department and other equally important matters, without bothering with anybody's goat. If the goat man amuses himself by such squibs, why, I suppose we ought not to object to his doing so—and there you are. As to the company referred to, they are making some tremendous claims for their machine, but I would advise you all to go slow in forming opinions until they have demonstrated that their proposition is practical. Don't invest any money until you are certain the scheme is all right. This is merely a matter of common sense precaution. This department and its editor are, rightly or wrongly, considered by a great many people as being an authority in matters pertaining to projection. We have no axe whatever to grind. There is not a manufacturer in the United States who can buy one cent's worth either of commendation or otherwise in this department. They cannot get the approval of the department or its editor until they have proven to our satisfaction that their goods are what they are claimed to be. Personally, I hope the scheme for continuous running of the film is practical, but the Keeley motor was believed by thousands of very smart people who actually witnessed its operation to be practical, and Mr. Keeley swept up a whole washtub of gold before his balloon exploded. I do not mean to insinuate by this that the machine in question is any such proposition; I am not hitting at anybody, but simply calling attention to the fact that if you hold off on the purchase of appliances pertaining to projection until these appliances have been presented to this department, and by it have been pronounced O. K., you will then at least be protected by an opinion which will be absolutely and entirely unbiased and in no way influenced—in other words, a thoroughly honest opinion which may save you money and a lot of worry and trouble. The sketch the brother refers to consists in attaching one end of a spiral spring to the take-up equalizer weight of an Edison machine, and the attachment of a string to its other end, the string being wound up on a sort of key attached to the front of the machine, just under the lens, the idea being to lessen or increase the belt equalizer tension by turning the key.

Standard Machine Troubles.

Mr. J. S. Perry, New York City, writes as follows:

> Am operating a Standard 1913 model. The tension is regulated by adjusting screws 491 and 492, plate 1, page 306 of the new handbook. Inasmuch as the screw is composed of an outer jacket and an inner section and a central pin the slot only being in the inner section, how do you turn the screw? It cannot be done with an ordinary screwdriver. To protect my eyes from the glare of the spot I made a shield as per attached sketch in which a-a are small holes drilled in the right side of the shutter box; b is the fire shield; c is the shield hinge which is shown turned over into the hinge at d, so as to fit with e-e of the shield, and just large enough to receive rod f. When threading the machine shield b closes to the left over the fire shutter. No doubt this same scheme can be used with modifications on other machines. The holes a-a are for the purpose of riveting the small hinge pieces to the shutter box.



The idea of the brother is to attach a metal shield to the side of the standard fire shutter box. His idea is entirely practical, but I would suggest as an improvement that the shield be made of glass of a pot green color. You can easily make a special screwdriver for turning the screw.

Wants to Organize.

From North Carolina comes a somewhat lengthy letter, the main part of which is devoted to an explanation of the writer's lack of knowledge of electrical terms and how to use them. He asks what course he can take to perfect himself. The letter is well written, and evidently comes from a man of superior intelligence. He concludes:

> I wish also that you would inform me how I could organize a local union here. There are several operators anxious to organize, and they have the money to back it up. Would any of the operators be obliged to leave town in order to become members of the I. A. T. S. E.? Would we have to go to any city to pass examination? Would the auxiliary branch charter allow us to take in more members?

The brother orders a handbook, and I would ask him to write me again after he has thoroughly studied that work. If he then feels that I can help him further I would be glad to do so. As to organizing, write Mr. Lee Hart, general secretary-treasurer of the I. A. T. S. E., Suite 63, No. 39 West Adams Street, Chicago, Ill. He will send you full data. There will be no necessity for any of you to leave town, I think. A provisional charter will allow you to take in more members. You will conduct your own examinations.

Houston Operators Organize.

We learn that the Houston, Texas, operators organized, with about thirty charter members. Further details are not at hand. We trust the new union will succeed.

"THE WONDERFUL STATUE" (Vitagraph), March 20.—A picture featuring Lillian Walker as a statue. The trouble with this is it has to eat. John Bunny, Flora Finch and Courtenay Foote also have roles. It is funny and made laughter, but isn't a great picture. A. A. Methley is the author, and the producer is Frederick Thomson.

"NEAR TO EARTH" (Biograph), March 20.—This same situation was recently used in a Pathe offering, "Broken Hearts," which was a little better than the present in photography and in acting, and also a little more concise in reaching its climax. To such as haven't seen the other, this will be a very acceptable offering. It is like a translation of the other to fit the Italian characters.

"HONOR THY MOTHER" (Melies), March 20.—This picture's situation (off the beaten track and meaty as it is) arrests the attention. The older stepbrother is caught by his father's wife and her son burning a will that left him sole heir but that made plain to the world a very unpleasant truth about his mother. The picture should have started with this scene, for nothing that went before was significant beside it, the picture's one big theme. The development from this scene is natural and convincing and it makes a very fair offering. The photography is full of quality, and the acting, though very fine at moments, is not smooth and falls down at the climax, where clear-cut emotional playing would have been of much service.

"DEEDEE'S BLIND MASTER" (Pathe), March 20.—A picture that features an extraordinarily well-trained dog and that gets over as well as any offering of its kind that we have seen. It fails to convince at times, and one feels that the picture's effects have been contrived and are mechanical. Deedee is a white fox terrier trained to attend a blind man, and in the picture, when his master's eyes are cured, forsakes him for a legless man. There is a good deal of comedy in it and an attempt at pathos. The photography is good. It seemed to be acceptable to the audience and gave some laughter.

"THE STRENGTH OF MEN" (Vitagraph), March 19.—A two-reel feature subject that will probably stir enthusiasm. It's a picture of Alaska and deals with two men and a girl. The tale is cleverly introduced and leads up to a race between the men for a rich gold claim. This is a long, grueling contest in which the two, in their canoes and each with an Indian helper, follow a rough line down a torrent half blocked by huge bowlders, and through a wild pine forest. To complicate matters the forest gets on fire, and this is used to bring out the human quality of the men, for it turns out that neither can save himself without the other's help. The picture is full of elemental vigor, and then has this human ending. There is marked freshness in it, and in the production of this the photography and the angle at which the scenes were taken play a very important part. All the camera work deserves high praise. Those blizzard scenes are unusual, and the water and the fire views are as good. The acting holds all through, and Miss Story (the girl) shows especially clear insight in one scene—that in which the first man comes back and finds her in her father's cabin with the stranger whom she doesn't really love. It's a big picture, a true feature.

"THE EX-CONVICT" (Selig), March 20.—There is a fine situation just before this picture's climax, but one feels that a good deal more might have been gotten out of it if it had been made the primary theme, and much of the early part been merely implied. The picture deals with the ex-convict who is being blackmailed by one who knew him in prison. He has a brother who looks like him and has heart disease. The brother dies in his room and he fixes it so that the blackmailer will be deceived, and the man is accused of murder. Oscar Eagle produced it from the script of A. P. Hankins. It is very well played, with C. Clary as the hero; J. Nelson, the fellow convict; W. Stowell, the brother. T. J. Commerford, Lillian Logan and others have roles. The photography is very good.

"THE TALE OF A CLOOK" (Essanay), March 20.—The idea in this offering was used more effectively in a former picture in which the girl was hidden in a new wardrobe, delivered by mistake and unexpectedly called for. It is a comedy, but while it was on we heard no laughter whatever. Billy Mason and Beverly Bayne play the leads.

"JIM, THE BURGLAR" (Lubin), March 20.—We have had the sleuth who, after learning how in a book, furnishes comedy; but this picture introduces us to a burglar who gets his degree. It is entirely fresh, and the audience found it quite laughable. Jim gets plenty of work at his new profession, but no money, and, after giving it a fair trial, goes to work as a hod carrier. George Reehm is perfect as Jim, and all its fun is reflected in his facial expression. E. W. Sargent is the author, and Arthur Hotaling produced it.

"MR. JINKS BUYS A DRESS" (Lubin), March 20.—A farcical offering that goes well with the other picture on the reel. In it Jerold T. Hovoner plays Jenks, a married man who gets drunk and buys a dress on its wax figure and takes it with him on his rounds. It stands up with him in front of the bar, but doesn't drink. Some trick photography helps out. The offering made much laughter. The author is A. T. Wentworth.

"FINNEGAN" (Essanay), March 19.—A comedy of Irish characters that might have been more amusing if it had been made more convincing. The audience was not very large this morning, but there was no audible laughter.

"MOTHER'S LAZY BOY" (Edison), March 19.—Another Edison picture full of convincing rural atmosphere and good characters, and its author, Mark Swan, hasn't looked at life with his eyes shut, either. It gives us glimpses of kitchen, bedroom, front yard and woodpile, and its center of interest is a lazy youth "chucking a bluff" while mother brings in her own coal, etc. A pretty girl comes to the village, and dad oversees a thing or two, and then he calls the bluff. William Wadsworth, as "Ben," is quite convincing, except in one or two scenes, where he seems self-consciously awkward. Charles Ogle's "Dad" is fine, as is Mrs. Bechtel's "Mother." Edna Flugrath is the pretty girl, and Mrs. C. J. Williams is her mother. Harry Beaumont and Bliss Milford also have roles. The story is smoothly told and natural; the photography is clear. A good, amusing offering.

"PRISONERS OF WAR" (Kalem), March 19.—A picture that seemed to please the audience, although its story will not bear analysis. It is very cleverly introduced by a series of scenes that lead up to the old veteran's story, the reason why they refuse him a pension. Then it has some war scenes that give action. It is well acted for the most part, and some of its photography is lovely. Robert Vignola, as the feeble old veteran, completely distinguishes himself and is in marked contrast to himself in the younger role, in the story he tells. Marian Cooper plays in the introduction and also in the conclusion, while Anna Nilsson has the female role in the story scenes. Henry Hallem and James Vincent also have roles.

"THE HOME IN SURBURBIA" (Vitagraph), March 19.—Florence Turner can stand alone in a scene and by putting a state of mind in her facial expression, can tickle a knowing laugh that will reveal volumes—see the opening scene of this picture for what we mean. For evidence of her ability subtilly to develop a significant situation, see the whole picture. She plays a girl with whom the hero (Tom Powers) is in love. He can't land her so gets an actress (Edith Hayward) to help in making her jealous and it ends with his marrying the actress. The picture is full of scenes, rich in freshly human significance and interests deeply. It shows Producer Larry Trimble's work at its best. The script was written by M. D. Merrick and is clearly developed; but the ending seems easily arrived at and is not strong for this reason. The picture gets us deeply interested in Florence and leaves with only Edith. The photography is almost perfect. A fine offering.

"THE ESCAPE" (Pathe), March 19.—Pathe seems to be partial to the escaping convict and this picture introduces two more. Yet in this case, as in most of its offerings, there is a new situation and a story that interests although it will hardly get as deep as usual into the emotions; for it doesn't convince, as real life. It was very fairly acted for the most part, and is set in good backgrounds.

"THE SHERIFF OF YAVAPAI COUNTY" (Selig), March 19.—William Duncan, author, producer and leading man, gives us another good picture with sweep and vigor. It has a situation, in general, like his others and has a climax following a chase of two hold-up men by the sheriff. There is real action, at this point, and suspense in marked degree. William Duncan plays the sheriff and the men he follows are Tom Mix and Lester Cunio who have just held-up Rex de Rosselli, father of the heroine, Myrtle Stedman. At the end the latter fires a winning shot and saves her sweetheart's life. The backgrounds are full of interest and the photographs are clear and often full of quality. A popular offering.

"THE DANCER'S REDEMPTION" (Selig), March 21.—Written by Gilson Willets and produced by Colin Campbell, this play is impressively played by a most competent cast. Bessie Eyton has the part of Magdalene and Thomas Santschi the role of Than, her lover. The priest is well portrayed by Al. W. Filson. It was a most excellent release for Good Friday.

"THE ANSWERED PRAYER" (Kalem), March 21.—This is a very short drama, which might well have been much shorter. There is no fault to be found with the acting. Adelaide Lawrence, the child who played the fisherman's daughter, was excellent. So also was Hazel Neason as the widow.

"THE CELERY INDUSTRY IN FLORIDA" (Kalem), March 21.—On the same reel is this interesting pictorial description of celery farming and shipping.

"THE PATHWAY OF YEARS" (Essanay), March 21.—Drama of the poetical, retrospective sort. Francis Bushman plays the dual role of John Mason of to-day and of years ago, and to him in great measure is due the success of the picture. It was not easy to put over. It is a story that will please adults, thoughtful ones, especially. Splendid aid is given in the making of the picture by Ruth Hennessy, who as the flower girl and later the adopted daughter is charming. Ruth Stonehouse also is good.

"RASTUS LOSES HIS ELEPHANT" (Pathe), March 21.—Good comedy, with something new in the chase line—an elephant is the pursuer. He follows the crowd upstairs and downstairs.

"THE DEATH HEAD MOTH" (Pathe), March 21.—On the same reel is this interesting excursion into the realm of natural history.

"FRIEND JOHN" (Lubin), March 21.—Arthur Johnson in this picture plays the role of a Quaker blacksmith, and plays it well. Also he directs the picture. He is in love with a girl who is won by a young man about town, who afterward neglects the bride. In a thrilling scene the blacksmith seeks out the erring husband and forces him to come with him to the wife. There he finds a baby. The husband's reformation follows. It is a good story.

"A MATTER OF MATRIMONY" (Vitagraph), March 21.—A good bit of comedy. Charles Bennett portrays a sea captain who tries to manage his own household—and fails. He makes several attempts to find a partner and likewise fails until Nancy Simpson (Mary Charleson) sets her cap for him and doesn't fail. Mr. Bennett and Miss Charleson have most of the work to do. Both take to comedy, and we can stand more of the same kind.

"THE DEAN'S DAUGHTERS" (Edison), March 21.—The daughters are Mary Fuller and Elsie McLeod. The dean is Robert Brower. Marc MacDermott has the role of an artist with whom the latter of the girls, one of his pupils, falls in love. She is without talent. When the artist discovers her infatuation he rather rudely dismisses her and sends her back to her father. The humiliation of the girl is resented by the older sister. She joins the school. The artist falls in love with her; when he declares his affection for her she denounces him and returns home triumphant—and in love with the man she repudiated. The untalented girl sees the situation. She tells the unhappy girl that the artist was not at fault; to him she sends a letter suggesting that he call on her sister. He does. All ends happily. There are some splendid situations. Bannister Merwin is the author, and the hand of a master is always in evidence. Mr. MacDermott and Miss Fuller contribute to a drama that is well worth seeing again on the same day—one of the best of a month.

"BRONCHO BILLY'S SISTER" (Essanay), March 22.—This same company used the situation in this picture not long ago in a story called "Where the Mountains Meet," if we remember; but there is some difference in the development. It is not a fresh offering, but has the qualities usually found in pictures of this make. The photography is very fair.

"LIFE IN SOMALILAND, EAST AFRICA" (Cines), March 22.—An interesting, hand-colored reel giving some fairly clear scenes of village life in Somaliland, a country of some importance and one that newspaper readers will know something about. A worthy offering, but short.

"A MOTORCAR ROMANCE" (Cines), March 22.—On the same reel is this, a conventional picture, set in interesting backgrounds and telling a story of a hotel flirtation at an Italian watering place It is naturally acted and well constructed; but lacks any real freshness of interest. The photography is of high quality.

"TAMANDRA, THE GYPSY" (Lubin), March 21.—The author and producer of this picture, George Nicholls, has done some fine work and this offering has more than one charming scene. Nothing could be lovelier of its kind than that picture, just outside Tamandra's door, when Ernestine Morley has found the son (Buster Johnson) of the gypsy and the man she loves, and there are many other scenes as fine, almost. What is more, the picture is very well acted throughout, Miss Ormi Hawley doing especially well in her emotional role as the gypsy, Tamandra. But beyond this, we can not truthfully praise the offering and do not care to repeat the uncomplimentary comments on it that we heard. The photography is almost perfect. It is a two-reel offering.

"PETE, THE ARTIST" (Lubin), March 22.—Another in the Pete series, written by Shannon Fife and produced by Barry O'Neil. It is not so good as "Pete Joins the Force," of a few days ago. But it has one or two amusing situations and made a little laughter. Peter Lang and Mrs. George B. Walters play the leads with the good support of Clarence Elmer and Marie Wierman. The photography is fair.

"BELINDA, THE SLAVEY" (Vitagraph), March 22.—This is the first of a series of Belinda farces that is to be released. Mrs. Breuil is the authoress and the script was produced by Burt Angeles. It is a farcical character picture and Florence Radinoff, as the boarding-house keeper, stands out in sharp contrast with the other funny characters who too often hide their humanity under the flat mask of clowns. The value of clown work comes mostly from its contrast with life, its unhumanity, and in such a picture as this, real comedy characters would have been of greater value. Mr. Dowling, who plays the grocer's boy, is comically tall and his physical peculiarity helps a good deal. Norma Talmadge, as Belinda, is fine, at times. It made some laughter, but not so much as we expected. The photography is clear.

"THE RISEN SOUL OF JIM GRANT" (Edison), March 22.—A picture with an ethical object; it is somewhat sentimental. Perhaps it is the least dramatic picture written by Bannister Merwin in many weeks; it is slow. The quality it has comes from its faces, which are very well worth while. That thug, played by Harry Gripp, a new player to us, is fine. We want to see Mr. Gripp again. Cora Williams' old blind woman is also good, and Leonie Flugrath, in her role, makes a strong appeal. Herbert Prior and Mrs. Erskine are good as the father and mother of Jim, played by Augustus Phillips. Richard Ridgley plays a rent collector. The photography is clear. The producer, C. J. Brabin deserves credit for sets and scenes.

"FATE" (Biograph), March 22.—This picture is easily the best offering of to-day's regular releases on account of its tremendously effective climax. We see a half-witted, sodden drunkard set a long fuse of shavings to a large keg of powder in the log cabin of a man who had once befriended him and to which immediately after, two little girls come home from school. But the son of the drunkard is hungry and also comes to the cabin for food, scaring away the children. In a moment, there is a terrible explosion; the cabin is knocked to pieces; but it is the son and not the children who dies. If such an explosion can be made more effective and real, it may be done in some later picture; but we think this will stand for a while. The photography is clear. Alfred Paget is the drunkard; Robert Harrow, his son, and Lionel Barrymore, his friend. On the other side, W. J. Butler is the father of the children, played by Mae Marsh and a little girl.

"A WELCOME INTRUDER" (Biograph), March 24.—The "intruder" is a little lost boy whom a kidnapper has laid, asleep, in the back of a wagon, and who is thus carried to a strange farm. In the picture Claire McDowell gives us another of those characters in which she can hardly be recognized. The child, who wins favor with her, is very engaging and will excite sympathy; but there is a certain flatness about the story, and it might have been made more dramatic if the producer had delayed showing us the fate of the child or had hidden the picture's happy ending under a different title. The photography of the exteriors is not quite up to standard, but the action is perfectly clear. Charles Mailes plays the boy's father, Charles West is the discharged workman who takes the boy.

"A MOONSHINER'S WIFE" (Lubin), March 24.—Opening with a scene in a gymnasium in which the hero-to-be strikes a man with his fist and kills him and then runs for his life, this picture, by J. M. Nicholls, starts with a situation that fails to convince or strongly interest us. It also is a long time in getting down to any business that is really dramatic. It does rise for a moment, when the moonshiner's wife has left her bed, and the jealous husband shoots the sheriff, who has been following the athletic culprit. Ormi Hawley and Edwin Carewe have the leads. It is a rather poor offering, and the only good scenes are interiors.

"THE OLD CLERK" (Selig), March 24.—It is well that motion pictures occasionally take up this theme—the trials of the old employe. With the public it seems to be popular even when no new light is thrown on the situation. In this case it is treated in a way that is far from being superficial and makes a good offering. Henry McRae is both author and producer. The old clerk is played by W. Hutchinson, and Herbert Rawlinson is the young man who takes the place of the old manager, Frank Clark. The interest is well sustained, although the ending is not convincing. The photography is clear.

"THE LONG AND THE SHORT OF IT" (Edison), March 24.—A little farce by C. M. Seay that brought out some very hearty laughter. Mr. Bragg gets fresh in a grocer's and is drubbed by a tall and a short man. Later the two come into a saloon and hear him telling a tall story about it. The fun comes more from the comical acting, especially Robert Milash's slow fall. William Bechtel plays the braggart. Harry Eytinge plays the police sergeant, and A. Houseman plays "Scrappy Joe." They are well supported.

"TEA AND TOAST" (Edison), March 24.—An amusing comedy, taken from a novel by Joseph C. Lincoln, "The Postmaster." It is a picture to make smiles rather than laughter, and its quality depends largely on the characters portrayed by William Wadsworth and Alice Washburn, the former as the dyspeptic sent to the country to live on tea and toast, and the latter as the neighbor who volunteers to look after him for a day or so, and who might have cured him had it not been for his dog that chases her off the place. C. J. Williams is the producer and has made a very fair offering. It is clearly photographed.

"THE HONOR SYSTEM" (Kalem), March 24.—A very commendable offering dealing with prison reform. Carlyle Blackwell holds the center of the stage with a strong portrayal of the evil effects of rough treatment on a prisoner and of the change when human treatment takes the place of brutality. Mr. Blackwell deserves more than passing notice for this work. The story is simple and natural enough to convince, and it plainly took the audience into camp—it was applauded. The backgrounds are perfect and are photographed as clearly as could be desired.

"THE ATTACK AT ROCKY PASS" (Kalem), March 24.—A Wild West story in which Indians attack a paymaster's wagon. A number of melodramatic incidents, purely stock properties, have been grouped around the main incident and furnish a love story. H. K. Harris is the author, and it was produced by George Milford. The attack upon and the rescue of the wagon are well brought out; but the offering, as a whole, is artificial and has a number of poorly photographed scenes. Marin Sais and Carlyle Blackwell have the leads.

"BROTHER BILL" (Vitagraph), March 24.—An offering with a very interesting situation, full of the life of the back-woods. In its setting of wild scenes it gets over pretty powerfully. The two central roles are played by Edith Story and Ned Finley (Bill). Bill's brother has fallen in love with a girl in the mountain village and has made a tough character there jealous. Bill, to save his brother, comes to town and, in a dramatic scene, takes the girl from a village dance by force. It is now very dramatically shown how the two fall in love with each other. In doing this the leading players acquit themselves most creditably and are well supported by Chester Hess, in the role of Jim. The whole story is clear, and the scenes are well photographed for the most part. It makes a good offering.

"PAULINE CUSHMAN, THE FEDERAL SPY" (Selig), March 24.—This film has been reviewed at length in this publication. There are two reels of real feature—in the number of men employed, in the direction or staging, and in the dramatic qualities as well as the spectacular side. Miss Greenwood, in the title role, was excellent. Although called upon to play a part in which masculine courage was necessary, she seemed always a woman—interesting and charming. Plainly the company has gone to great expense to make this picture, and the result has justified it. The theater scene, where the actress toasted the Confederacy, was especially well done. It was an unusual setting. The battle scenes were notable also.

"DICK, THE DEAD SHOT" (Vitagraph), March 25.—There is in this comedy an old-fashioned chase—marred by an abundance of static. The picture is not strong, although it may appeal to some audiences. William Shea, Charles Eldridge—who, in the guise of a hungry parson, made some fun—and Kate Price did their best to put the picture over.

"BREAD ON THE WATERS" (Edison), March 25.—Fair drama. It is written by Bannister Merwin. Richard Tucker, as George Varick, the down-and-out who is reclaimed, does good work. His acting is restrained and intelligent.

"HE NEEDED THE MONEY" (Cines), March 25.—Comedy which is slow in arriving, but when the story is developed makes a hearty laugh. It is a tale of a young man out of funds who is refused a loan by his uncle. Later, when the uncle makes an appointment with a charming young woman—known to the nephew—to take dinner with him, the nephew applies for a place as waiter in the hotel. On the bill which he makes out for the uncle the nephew doubles his demands—and gets the money.

"THE FIXER" (Lubin), March 25.—This is a story of a hen-pecked husband who thinks he is also a gay boy. He is detected by his wife in one of his flirtations, and she makes things warm for him. To get revenge he induces a friend to try a flirtation with his wife. The friend tries and fails miserably, and besides gets in trouble with his sweetheart. There is mild fun.

"SUCH AN APPETITE" (Lubin), March 25.—On the same reel as the foregoing is this good farce-comedy.

"THE SCALES OF JUSTICE" (Selig), March 25.—Charles Clary by his work makes of this play all there is in it. He has much to do and does it well. The drama is of pronounced mechanical construction—there are convenient coincidences. Carl Winterhoff, as the ward boss, is convincing; so also is the chief of police. One of the liberties taken in the scenario is the ascribing to New York City of a board of police commissioners—and of course there is none. At another time the chief of police—which New York does not possess—is represented as dismissing a sergeant of police from the force on the spot—which he cannot do. Even in film plays regard should be had for the ordinary rules of procedure.

"THE SHERIFF'S HONEYMOON" (Essanay), March 25.—There is in this near-burlesque one good title—that where the sheriff starts off to bring back a wife which he has obtained by correspondence, and tells his deputies that he is going after a life prisoner. The story is not strong.

"THE BABES IN THE WOODS" (Patheplay), March 25.—This finely hand-colored juvenile will interest adult audiences. There are many double exposures; plainly great care was taken in the making of this picture.

Independent

"THE VENGEANCE OF HEAVEN" (Reliance), March 19.—This two-reel offering is well pictured and has a good story in it, though somewhat faulty in construction. If the blasting of the tree and death of the villain had been shown first it would have presented a very good mystery. As it is, the element of suspense is lacking, but the manner in which the bullet finally reaches the man for which it was intended is ingenious. Irving Cummings appears as the fickle lover who brings misery to so many hearts and death to himself. The photography is good, and the film as a whole interesting.

"A WIFE WANTED" (Keystone), March 20.—This half reel is characterized by plenty of action and shooting and very little plot. It concerns the efforts of Wild Steve to obtain a wife.

"THE RUBE AND THE BARON" (Keystone), March 20.—In this Fred Mace appears as the baron, and Mack Sennett as the rube. Mabel Normand is, of course, the pretty girl over whom they wrangle. Fairly amusing.

"HER GALLANT KNIGHTS" (Thanhouser), March 23.—This film contains some interesting pictures of an orange exhibit in Southern California. The oranges are displayed in many forms. A slight comedy is shown in connection with the exhibit, in which Flo LaBadie has some amusing experiences with three or four lovers, but finally announces her engagement to a New York man. Not strong, but rather pleasing.

"AT TWELVE O'CLOCK" (Keystone), March 27.—Once again this company has hit upon an exceptionally good burlesque idea, which is worked out in first-class form. Fred Mace, as the big Mexican bruiser in love with the bewitching Miss Normand, contrives a terrible punishment for all who thwart him. The girl is to be shot by means of clockwork, on the stroke of twelve, but the hero holds back the hands of the clock by means of a large magnet. The situations are extremely funny, and the travesty, which occupies a full reel, is above the ordinary offering of the kind.

"MARRIED IN HASTE" (Eclair), March 30.—A cowboy burlesque that has nothing that is truly fresh and only a few laughs. It is a bit vulgar. The leading man shows comedy ability.

"HER NEW CHAUFFEUR" (Rex), March 30.—A farcically played, dramatic comedy that cannot be commended as entertainment. It shows a sad lack of construction. Such a story as this needs to be, in a measure, convincing, but this is not so at all.

"SUPERSTITIOUS MARY" (Nestor), March 31.—A farce that has a certain speedy sweep, and that is acted cleverly to get everything possible out of the situation. Therefore it is entertaining. Mary has warning enough that she ought not to marry her mother's choice of a husband—the date of the wedding is Friday the 13th, her cake is dropped and broken, a big painting falls on her presents, and, last of all, the groom is too drunk to come to the wedding, so Mary calls up her choice and they elope. The photography is very fair.

"MUM'S THE WORD" (Nestor), March 31.—A picture that is full of hearty laughs. It shows now a reporter on a newspaper "covers" a deaf and dumb asylum. He copies the language without understanding it, and gets what wouldn't have come to him if he had known. This double offering is worthy.

"THE CRIMINALS" (Mecca), March 29.—A story of Italians in America, with a band of "black hand" criminals working in the background, except for one moment, when the little Italian child is killed by the band because its father won't "come across." Two unconvincing incidents weaken the effect of the situation when the child's father is mistaken by the police for the criminal who had bereaved him and put in jail. The sets, acting and photography are commendable.

"DO IT NOW" (Powers), April 2.—A little farce that has good laughs a-plenty and that will be thoroughly enjoyed by all kinds of spectators. A business man gets some cards printed, "Do It Now." The senior clerk, who has been losing heavily on the races, is tempted to break the safe, and does it now. The junior clerk wants to run away with his employer's daughter, and does it now. This idea is made much of in several different ways, and when the salesman of the "Do It Now" cards comes with a fresh idea for a card to advise "boosting" he gets boosted, and neatly. There is some perfect photography in it. The character of the business man is very well played.

"BOBBY'S BABY" (Rex), April 6.—A story with a punch. There is a boy in this picture who steals milk in order that a baby may live. The little one is hidden in a barn. The boy is caught in the act of taking milk from a full pail. In the meantime the cries of the child have been heard by a man and woman who recently have lost their only offspring. It is taken home by them, cared for and put into the empty and waiting cradle. The boy finds his ward, and in turn becomes also the ward of the two benefactors. Phillips Smalley and Lois Weber have the leads, and their work will appeal to every audience. The whole film is embellished with excellent photography.

"ANIMATED WEEKLY, NO. 54" (Universal), March 19.—This number contains scenes from the Mardi Gras at Panama, pictures of the new Woolworth skyscraper, the Dewey Hotel fire in Omaha, Rodman Law jumping from Queensborough bridge in a parachute, and many other items of interest.

"THE BISHOP'S CANDLESTICKS" (Imp), April 3.—This two-reel offering gives us the scenes from Les Miserables in which Jean Valjean robs the good bishop of his beloved candlesticks. The bishop, whose heart is very tender, says he gave Valjean the candlesticks and by this show of kindness saves his soul. The motive is a powerful one and while this version of it suffers somewhat in contrast with the familiar stage dramatization by James K. Hackett, it is well above the average drama. Frank Smith, as the bishop, is a larger man than Wm. T. Shay, who plays Valjean, and thus the contrast is lost, but the parts are well handled. A good offering.

"THE LIGHT IN THE WINDOW" (Bison), March 25.—A story of the South before and during the Civil War, in two reels. The first reel shows us a plantation on which the cruel master flogs his slaves, much to the disgust of his young son. The boy runs away and later appears as a Union officer. The fighting, in the second reel, is spirited and occurs in the open country and the woods. We feel that these scenes give us a glimpse of actual warfare. The story has a pathetic close; the father is killed, and the mother, who sits at the window with her candle burning, shoots her son by mistake. It is all done in a very convincing manner, and the production is a strong one of its type.

"THE TENDERFOOT'S TURN" (Frontier), March 27.—This is the familiar story of the young man from the East who goes West and has a hard time learning to be a cowboy. But he finally turns the tables on his persecutors and gets the girl. The film is somewhat cloudy.

"THE IMPOSTOR" (Gaumont), Special.—In this three-reel picture Gaumont gives us a drama of increasing interest. There are strong situations and dramatic moments. The cast is an excellent one and a large one. The story is of the attempt of a band of swindlers to deceive a widow and to impose on an old mother a bogus daughter-in-law. How the crime was uncovered and the adventurers brought to justice makes an interesting story.

"BURSTUP HOMES' MURDER CASE" (Solax), March 26.—Broad farce. There is a burlesque Sherlock Holmes. Blanche Cornwall and Darwin Karr have the leads. The former is more convincing in her laughter than she is in her tears. The story is slight.

"THE WAY OF THE TRANSGRESSOR" (Solax), March 21.—Exaggerated melodrama, accentuated by two killings, one of which, by a policeman, would, in life, have subjected him to a charge of manslaughter at least. There is plenty of excitement, it is true, but the story is at times illogical.

"TILL DEATH DO US PART" (Pilot), March 21.—This picture has been reviewed at length in The World. We can only affirm the many good things said then of this fine photodrama. It is one that will stand up and stand out in any company.

"PAT WISHES TO ECONOMIZE" (Lux), March 21.—Comedy of the furniture-breaking, house-destroying sort. It will furnish amusement to the more frivolously inclined.

"MISS SIMPTON'S JEWELS" (Lux), March 21.—On the same reel as the foregoing is this thrilling story of an attempted burglary on a train and the arrest of the thieves.

"THE MAN EATER" (Lux), March 28.—There are some thrills in this animal picture. One especially is where a surveyor is watching at a window for marauding natives seeking to do damage to an African railroad. A lion enters and attacks the watcher. There are other features to recommend the picture.

"BILLY'S DOUBLE" (Gem), April 1.—Two characters are here taken by Billy Quirk. As there is no simultaneous appearance the necessity for double exposure is avoided. There is no story worthy the name, and that is some handicap even on a good comedian.

"BILLY'S MISTAKEN OVERCOAT" (Gem), March 25.—A farce the subject matter of which is worn to a thin edge. The most of it is made, however, by Billy Quirk and Billie Baier, who do good work.

"ROSES OF REMEMBRANCE" (Nestor), March 21.—Splendidly photographed and set amid superb backgrounds is this story of Mexico. It is a good picture.

"BACHELOR BILL'S BIRTHDAY PRESENT" (Powers), April 4.—This is an entertaining Western comedy, in which Edwin August finds a cute baby in his shack. He feeds it milk and whiskey and takes a strong liking to it. He advertises for a nurse and its own mother applies for the position. The natives begin to criticise, but Bill marries the mother and all ends happily. A good comedy release.

"THE DRUMMER'S NOTEBOOK" (Crystal), March 30.—Two couples, Lovey and Dovey, and Honey and Bunny, get their affairs tangled, because one girl advises the other to flirt. In the end disaster is averted.

"IT'S A BEAR!" (Crystal), March 30.—This, on same reel with above, is a good hunting burlesque. The man who impersonated a bear got enough of his job, but it brought the girl's father to time. As a whole, this is a good reel.

"A NIGHT OF ANGUISH" (Eclair), March 26.—This two-reel offering contains many situations of decided interest and one or two which bring genuine thrills. Mrs. Lindsay's climb down the side of the railroad bridge was realistic enough to suit anyone, and the station agent's dream of bringing his own wife to death was well devised. The opening reel contained a number of artistic and appealing situations. The firelight effects were good and the proposal very creditably done. The climax also is interesting and as a whole, the production is fresh and entertaining.

"TO RENO AND BACK" (Imp), March 27.—This comedy offering succeeds in being brisk and smart without being in any sense offensive. King Baggot and Jane Gail are the young couple whose matrimonial difficulties furnish the motif for the film story. There are innumerable giggles and many laughs in this, which is a very desirable release.

"CUPID IN UNIFORM" (Imp), March 31.—There is a pretty little romance in this, in which the messenger boy acts as a go-between for quarreling lovers. It is rather overdrawn, as we do not believe messenger boys see quite as much emotion in cases like this as "Freckles" saw, but it makes an amusing picture story. The boy is injured and the lovers make up at his bedside.

"INNOCENT DAD" (Imp), March 29.—A good farcical offering, in which August and "dad" do a little celebrating and are found out.

"NERVOUS LEO" (Imp), March 29.—A laughable French eccentric in which Leo's twitching head has a contagious effect on all who come in contact with him. This, with the above, make a lively comedy reel.

"THE WIDOW'S FOLLY" (Nestor), April 2.—A Western story sufficiently different and well acted to hold the attention well. The wealthy widow comes near being the prey of an adventurer, but the hero recovers from his injury in time to save her. The photography is smooth and clear.

"THE GRAFTERS" (Reliance), March 22.—The action in this picture centers about the opening of bids for a paving contract. Quite a little tension is gotten up, as we see the heroine running to the board meeting and overcoming difficulties on the way. The running effects are rather novel, and the whole is a pleasing production.

"THE WRONG MISS WRIGHT" (Majestic), March 23.—This combines scenes along the Atlantic Coast, beginning with lower New York, with a slight comedy plot. The hero wires his friend for an introduction to Flora Wright, but the friend gives him an introduction to her old maid sister. Mildly amusing.

"THE JUDGE'S VINDICATION" (Reliance), March 19.—A two-reel film by Marion Brooks, combining higher finance and higher politics in a not entirely new but thoroughly interesting way. E. P. Sullivan gives us a strong study of a judge resisting the behests of the money trust. In a series of scenes we see him visited by men who desire to bribe him. He defies them and for this is himself charged with bribery. Irving Cummings appears as the star reporter, who clears the judge and wins the girl. He picks pockets, holds up several men and does many things that reporters seldom ever do, but these exaggerated incidents can perhaps be excused, as the picture is strong enough to overcome them.

"THE LEGEND OF THE EVERGLADES" (Excelsior), March 24.—The old darky's rendition of the legend of the Everglades makes material for a strong film. The cruel master beating his slaves and their subsequent rebellion is convincingly shown; the firing of the cabin and tragic fate of the master and his wife is also good. Then we follow the wanderings of the girl for many years through the Everglades, till the death of herself and her lover. A film story containing new scenic effects and excellent photography.

"HIS DAY OF FREEDOM" (Reliance), March 26.—Showing the manner in which Convict No. 333 escapes from prison in a box of shoes and arrives in a village store. He steals money and the girl's lover is blamed, but the convict relents and gives himself up. The film makes a good impression and tells a satisfactory story.

"A WELL MEANT DECEPTION" (Majestic), March 30.—An old theme, worked up into a fairly interesting story. The artist marries a cabaret singer and when his uncle comes does not want him to know. But the uncle goes to the cabaret and discovers not only that the girl is singing there, but also that she is the unknown person who has been purchasing the artist's pictures.

"HER NEW BEAU" (Keystone), March 31.—Mack Sennett and Fred Mace in a series of park scenes, in which there is more action than plot.

"ON HIS WEDDING DAY" (Keystone), March 31.—This, on same reel with above, is a comic offering in which Schnitzler has a hard time getting married. Only fairly amusing.

"THE SINEWS OF WAR" (Broncho), April 2.—A two-reel war story, pictured with much clearness and filled with intense, dramatic scenes. Impersonations of General Lee and General Grant are given. The battle scenes are very effectively done; the burning of the warehouse is a strong feature. The love story blends nicely with the various incidents and as a whole the production is a very desirable one.

"HIDE AND SEEK" (Keystone), April 3.—There are some very funny moments in this offering, as it is based upon a definite plot and the audience knows just what is going on. The child is supposed to be locked in the time safe, and the efforts to get it open pile up some laughable situations.

"THE LAND SALESMAN" (Keystone), April 3.—This, on same reel with above, gives a slight story in connection with stump blasting scenes. The blasting is very interesting.

"WITH LEE IN VIRGINIA" (Kay-Bee), April 4.—Another war drama in two reels, in which graphic warfare is mingled with a strong story interest. General Lee and Lincoln and his Cabinet are impersonated in the opening scenes. The hero, a union officer, is in the home of the heroine, where she conceals him. There is a fine complication of incidents, all very carefully worked out and which the observer follows breathlessly. The old slave saves the girl by saying he shot the slain officer. He is executed in consequence. The fighting is dramatic and well ordered, and the final scene a pathetic one. A very good release.

"FOR HER BOY'S SAKE" (Thanhouser), March 25.—A human interest story, covering many years of time. In the first part we see the manner in which the woman's son robs a safe to obtain money for a girl. For this he is convicted and passes out of the picture. Ten years later, as a scrub woman in an office building, she sees a clerk about to yield to the same weakness, because his wife is ill. She gives her savings to him. The closing scene is very pathetic, and while not entirely new, the story is a successful one.

"CYMBELINE" (Thanhouser), March 28.—The Shakesperian drama is here worked out in two reels, with good scenic effects. Flo LaBadie and James Cruze play the parts of Imogene and Leonatus, but the whole Thanhouser Company joins forces to make the cast a balanced one. The costuming is sumptuous and the scenes pleasing throughout because of their clean-cut staging. The visit of the Roman officer to Imogene's bed chamber, where he takes the bracelet from her wrist as she sleeps, was artistically presented. The battle scenes in the second reel hold the interest well; also the manner in which the separated family of Cymbeline finally becomes reunited. A good offering.

"MATCHES" (American), April 3.—One of the best light comedy offerings we have seen for some time. Three couples and their love affairs conspire to hold the interest, and so ingeniously is the plot put together that the developments hold a strong interest for the observer. The scenes are artistic and pleasing and the characterizations good; the photography is also good. An unusually attractive light comedy.

"THE RENEGADE'S HEART" (American), March 31.—Good photography helps along this Western story. The girl secretes Black Jack when he is badly wanted. Her father later needs $5,000 and Black Jack gives himself up, out of gratitude to the girl, as there is a reward for that amount on his head. The whole conception, including the incident of the handkerchief tied to the tree, is improbable, but it will please many observers.

"THE MUTE WITNESS" (American), April 5.—A trap for catching and photographing wild animals is employed in this to capture the villain and picture his assault upon the girl's father. The scheme works with good effect, and makes material for a new, if not very probable, picture.

"THE CLIMAX" (Solax), March 28.—There is a breeziness in the story of this picture that keeps one interested from first to last. The husband needs a climax for the play he has just written. His wife has foolishly relied upon the friendliness of a certain man, and her husband's experience in rescuing her from her unpleasant predicament furnishes him with valuable literary material. The acting is evenly natural throughout, the story runs smoothly, the sets are good and it is well photographed. There is a scene under the lamp that is lovely.

WARNER'S FEATURE NOTES.

REMARKABLE LIST OF NEW ELECTRICAL INSTRUMENTS.

J. C. Deagan, the well known manufacturer of musical novelty instruments, announces in his advertisement, in this issue of the Moving Picture World, a new catalogue, introducing 240 different, electrically operated instruments, particularly suited for motion picture theaters, and which can be played either individually, collectively, or in any combination in connection with a piano easily manipulated by the piano player.

A representative of the Moving Picture World recently made a call at the home of the Deagan Bells, a beautifully appointed and modern factory, costing $250,000, located at 1770 Berteau Avenue, Chicago. Claude Deagan, the genial young manager, conducted the World man through the factory and showed him a great number of remarkable instruments, which, no doubt, will make a great hit in motion picture theaters. The two most striking instruments are the new improved Musical Electric Bells and the new Deagan Electric Cathedral Chimes. The Musical Electric Bells have been improved considerably. They can be played soft or loud, single stroke or vibrating, at the will of the operator, by merely pressing buttons conveniently located on an ivory keyboard. The bells are mounted on a handsomely nickel-plated floor rack, but can also be distributed around various parts of the theater, if so desired.

A truly beautiful instrument is the Electrical Cathedral Chimes, made of the purest bell metal. It gives the best imitation of church chimes ever produced. These chimes are also electrically operated from an ivory key-board, and can be distributed throughout the theater, the same as the Deagan Musical Electrical Bells. Other new instruments are the new style Swiss Electric Bells, the Electric Octaphone, the Electric Orchestra Bells, the Electric Parsifal Bells, the Electric Steel Marimbaphone and Electric Xylophones.

OBSERVATIONS

BY OUR MAN ABOUT TOWN

THE nineteenth annual meeting of the electrical committee of the National Fire Protection Association will be held at 123 William Street, New York City, on the 26th and 27th insts. The rooms in which the meeting will be held are those occupied by the New York Board of Fire Underwriters. Committee reports and suggestions for changes in the "National Electrical Code" will be considered. Among the reports will be one by the committee on theater and moving picture establishment wiring, which will submit a new section to be added to the rules under the heading. "Moving Picture Equipments of Approved Miniature Type for Home Lecture and Similar Purposes." The section will embrace four rules as follows: (1) Arc lamp used as a part of machine must be constructed as far as practicable similar to arc lamps of theaters, and must not require more than 350 watts to operate same; (2) the rheostat or other current controlling device must conform to the requirements for similar devices for theater work, and must be attached to and form a part of the machine; (3) films must be of the non-inflammable type and must not be more than 100 feet in length and one inch in width; (4) where the use of an approved booth is dispensed with, a mat made of asbestos or other approved material must be placed under the machine when in operation; this mat to be of such size and so arranged that machine may be easily and quickly enveloped in same in case of accident to film.

Miss Florence Turner, late one of the most popular members of the Vitagraph stock company, made a big hit both at the Halsey Street and Fifth Avenue theaters, Brooklyn, following the close of her successful engagement at the 116th Street Theater, Manhattan. Miss Turner was exceedingly popular with the employees of the Vitagraph. She always had a cheery smile and a kind word for all of them, particularly for the girls and young women employed in the film departments. When they learned Miss Turner was booked for Brooklyn engagements these employees prepared to give her a cordial reception. One night the joining room girls occupied boxes at the Halsey. The first night Miss Turner appeared at the Fifth Avenue, the printing room girls filled the boxes. The little actress was much affected by the cordiality accorded her by the groups. They showered flowers upon her and wildly waved flags bearing the Vitagraph imprint as she made her appearance upon the stage.

As a part of her monologue Miss Turner takes occasion to announce that her new departure does not mean that she will not be seen in the motion pictures again, as it is her intention to combine with others in the production of pictures in which she will be starred, as already announced in a recent issue of the Moving Picture World.

Among the latest rumors bearing upon the incorporation of new companies for the production of motion pictures is one to the effect that a company is about to be formed by twenty-five publishers and a number of authors. It is stated that the combination is to be a co-operative one, the publishers and authors sharing in the profits derived from the film productions of the latter's work. The name given as that of the proposed combination is "The Famous Fiction Film Company." The incentive of this scheme is said to have emanated from the Daniel Frohman undertaking. One of the chief aims is to attract attention to certain fiction publications through the film productions. Now that motion pictures have forced general recognition for themselves, hardly a day passes that some new scheme to make use of them in some way is not developed. The resources afforded by motion pictures are unlimited, but it is feared that ere long schemes will become so numerous that the outlet for them will become choked and many ventures will fall by the wayside. It may well be said "everybody's doing it" and at the same time there is a certainty that a good thing may be overdone.

Following the examples set by many of the foreign municipalities, Greater New York has turned to motion pictures as an agency for the enlightenment of school children on municipal government and hygienic rules. The chairman of the Public Health and Education Committee has had films made showing the importance of care of the teeth. It is claimed that exhibition of the films will eliminate absence from the schools on account of tooth troubles. The undertaking is a commendable one. It is hoped the exhibition of the films will not be restricted to the school rooms. Arrangements should be made for their exhibition in the motion picture houses, so that interest may be elicited on the part of parents as well as the pupils. This plan has been adopted for the exhibition of motion pictures especially made for showing the work of the street cleaning department. Clean streets and clean teeth are akin. No better selection of films can be made for the picture houses, as they treat upon subjects in which everybody in all walks of life should be greatly interested.

And along the municipal lines let another step be taken. The Board of Health should get busy and follow the example set by the municipal authorities of Berlin, Germany. There the meat inspectors have called motion picture cameras to their aid in determining if food products are in proper condition. The films show the micro-organisms in motion should the inspected meats be diseased. While the municipalities of foreign lands are cited as launching examples to be followed, it should not be assumed that they originated the ideas involved. Due credit must be given an American brain. Mr. Charles Urban, of London, England, was the first to demonstrate the great value and possibilities of the motion picture camera along the lines stated. For several years he has produced a number of highly commendable subjects, but they failed to gain the recognition they deserved owing to the tardiness that attended the willingness of the public to give motion pictures the attention now accorded them. When the pictures now prepared and in course of operation secure public approbation, which they surely will, we will then turn admiring and grateful glances to Mr. Urban as the grand old man of the municipal utility of motion pictures. Where does the American brain fit in? Oh, yes; that was almost forgotten. Mr. Urban has been in England so long that he is looked upon as a native of that country. He is not. He was born in America and resided here many years. When visiting here, having acquired the accent of his adopted country to some extent, Mr. Urban derives much pleasure from the discomfiture occasioned some of the people he meets who cater to him in the belief that he is among the brilliant products of His Majesty's domain. He has always had a warm heart for the land of his birth, and now that Kinemacolor has been received here so well the warmth of his heart is still greater. Mr. Urban deserves all the success he has attained. He was and is among the hardest working pioneers in the field of animated photography and has advanced scores of original and commendable ideas in the field.

Here is a new one. Two exhibitors were discussing the advantage to motion picture houses by having well-known photoplayers make personal appearances in them. One said it helped advertise the pictures and increased the box office receipts very appreciably. The other concurred in the statement, but added that he never had a player appear at his house in person because he believed that it dispels an illusion that is an important factor in the business. "I have watched closely appearances at other houses," he said, "and almost invariably I have found that the audiences have been disappointed and eventually the player loses prestige with them. The players in the flesh do not seem to meet the ideals which their appearances in the pictures have created in the minds of the people. That is how I account for requests for reappearances being rare."

POWER'S CAMERAGRAPH INSTALLATION.

A Power's Cameragraph No. 6A has been installed in the St. Michael's School, Clinton Avenue and High Street, Hoboken, N. J., through the Universal Film Exchange of New York. The Broadway Theater, 41st Street and Broadway, New York City, has installed two Power's Cameragraph No. 6A through the People's Vaudeville Company.

MISS STONEHOUSE RESUMES WORK.

Ruth Stonehouse, the charming leading lady of the Essanay Eastern stock company, returned to work last Monday. Miss Stonehouse has been ill for the last three weeks with scarletina. A surprise party was given in her honor by the members of the stock company. A beautiful floral piece was sent to Miss Stonehouse by the photoplay "fans" of Denver. Miss Stonehouse will be featured in some forthcoming dramatic productions.

Motion Picture Exhibitors' League

WASHINGTON EXHIBITORS ORGANIZE.

The Washington State Association of Moving Picture Exhibitors has joined with the Motion Picture Exhibitors League of America and become the Washington State Branch No. 35. Details of the first annual convention held in Seattle, Feb. 18th and 19th, were withheld until a report could be made on the outcome of the fight against the adverse legislation then pending in the State legislature at Olympia.

An active committee backed by the newly organized state league succeeded in killing two bills which would have seriously injured the business of every exhibitor in the state. One bill provided for state wide Sunday closing of all theaters and the other for a board of examiners for all operators of moving picture machines. Such board to be composed exclusively of certain operators. The exhibitor had no representation whatever on the board.

Under the cloak of a public safety measure the bill gained much support. Now that these bills are both dead we can send the news of the first victory for our young organization in the fight for a square deal for the exhibitor. In no other way could we have won the battle than with the strength and prestige of an active league of exhibitors.

The new officers of the Washington Branch are: President, A. B. Campbell—Sedro Wooley; Natl. Vice-Pres., John Rautz—Bremerton; First Vice-Pres., James Q. Clemmer, Seattle; Second Vice-Pres., Fred Mercy—North Yakima; Secy.-Treas., W. L. Shanks, Seattle and H. O. Allen, Executive Committee.

The next meeting of the Washington State Branch will be held in Seattle June 17th.

BIRMINGHAM EXHIBITORS ORGANIZE.

At a meeting held at Birmingham, Ala., March 22, Henry F. Beaumont, a prominent member of the Birmingham Ad Club, was elected secretary of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of Birmingham, which was recently chartered by the national league of motion picture men. Mr. Beaumont was appointed chairman of the publicity committee of the league on its organization and his election to the secretaryship of the body is assumed to be in recognition of his valued services. The officers of the league are E. H. Colley, of the Vaudette, president; H. M. Newsome, who owns four theaters, vice-president; T. S. Abernathy, Odeon One and Odeon Two, treasurer, and Henry F. Beaumont, secretary.

A State convention of motion picture men, held under the auspices of the local league, met here Monday, March 24, and M. A. Neff, president of the national body, was the guest of honor.

IOWA CITY THEATERS GET "CLEAN BILL."

While digging up information that would aid in the passing of a bill to regulate public amusements in the State of Iowa, the State Law Librarian of that State got the following "clean bill of health" for the picture theaters of Iowa City, Ia., from County Attorney Hart of that city:

"Iowa City's moving picture shows, vaudeville entertainments, and other attractions of theatrical type are clean, moral, and worthy of commendation. The men in charge are citizens of highest standing in the community, and would remit nothing improper or immoral to be displayed in their respective theaters, even if there were no law on the subject."

This is the "clean bill' that County Attorney Hart gives the following theaters: Thomas A. Brown's American, Fred Dever's Pastime, Archie Hanlon's Iowa Theater, Thos. A. Brown's Nickeldom, W. H. Englert's Theater.

WEST VIRGINIA CONVENTION.

The fourth annual convention of the motion picture exhibitors league of West Virginia will be held at Wheeling, W. Va., on April 15 and 16. Organizer Clem Kerr, of Dayton, Ohio, and Secretary L. R. Thomas are working hard to make the meeting a success. Many Ohio exhibitors from the Wheeling district, Ohio side, will be present to help with the shouting. The meetings will be held in the new Wheeling Auditorium and special advantages for manufacturers' exhibits will be afforded.

West Virginia exhibitors are urged to attend this meeting as many matters of importance will be considered. A number of proposed legislative enactments will come up for discussion, namely, legislation governing taxes and licenses, a bill for a State examining board for operators, a Sunday opening law, and an censorship bill.

A special program for the entertainment of the delegates and guests has been arranged by the committee in charge and members are urged to bring their wives to enjoy the good time being prepared.

TO FIGHT PENNSYLVANIA LEGISLATION.

Pittsburgh motion picture men and owners of small vaudeville theaters are preparing to beseige the Pennsylvania state legislature to enter their protest against the passage of the bill introduced into the house of Representatives by George Allen of Allegheny County, which provides that all amusement places must be licensed under a state law. The bill is now in the hands of the house committee on law and order, and it is probable that action will be taken on the bill during the next two weeks. The opposition is coming from all parts of the State and the members of the legislature are daily receiving many letters asking them to vote against the bill if it is reported out of committee. The local Motion Picture Exhibitor's League has taken a strong stand against thhe passage of the bill and the officers of Local No. 1 of this city have prepared a protest against the measure that should receive the support of all the exhibitors. A representative of the local organization will go to Harrisburg when the bill is brought and personally urge the quashing of the measure.

PREFERS THE SMALL TOWN.

Mr. and Mrs. William F. Nolan of Opelousas and Thibadeau, La., paid a short visit to New York the other day and spent most of their time doing the picture theaters and studios. Mr. Nolan owns theaters in both towns and remarked, after looking over a number of New York picture houses, that he couldn't see that any of them had anything on him, especially when it came to projection. Mrs. Nolan, a charming young woman of undoubted Southern birth, was pronounced in her loyalty to her home town and insisted that New York did not tempt her in the least.

FEATURE FILM RENTERS' CREDIT ASSOCIATION MEETING.

The next regular meeting of the Feature Film Renters Credit Assn., of Ohio, is scheduled to be held at the secretary's office, Columbia Bldg., Cleveland, O., April 1st, at 3 p. m. All members are earnestly requested to be present at this meeting, as there is business of great importance to be transacted.

A. E. SIEGEL, Secretary.

A FORTY-FIVE-MINUTE TALKING PICTURE.

At the Gaumont Palace Hippodrome in Paris, a few days ago, there was exhibited a speaking film running forty-five minutes. This is by far the longest talking picture ever thrown on the screen. The photoplay was taken from a famous French farce and was witnessed by nearly eight thousand people, the extreme capacity of the house. The dialogue was distinctly heard in the farthest corners of the auditorium without appearing unduly amplified to those in the pit. The Paris Daily papers gave the Gaumont talking pictures from four inches to three-quarters of a column next morning and described the entertainment as a revolution in the cinematographic art. Speaking photoplays running from twenty to thirty minutes are now being shown nightly by means of the Gaumont improved Chronophone in the Gaumont Palace Hippodrome.

Making Pictures With Bloodhounds

IN a letter from Jacksonville, Jack J. Clark, leading man of the Gene Gauntier Feature Players, tells of the trials of the picture player when dealing with sure-enough bloodhounds which, in this instance, were secured from Sheriff Dowling of Duval County, Fla., by Director Sid Olcott. The picture was "The Mystery of Pine Tree Camp." The dogs were tested by the liberation of a negro convict, with a start of fifteen minutes over the dogs. Success attended the try-out, and the colored man was treed in short order. In the picture Mr. Clark and Mr. Olcott were to be fastened together with a ball and chain and were to have but fifteen seconds' start over the hounds. The run was to be short; it had to be. But here's the story:

"The morning came bright and clear, and we left in our launch for Hogan, a small town on the creek nine miles from Jacksonville. Mr. Olcott and Miss Gauntier, in order to pick up the dogs on the way, went around by road. I have read of the feelings of men in the death chamber awaiting execution; but, believe me, they had nothing on me as I steered that boat up the creek. A dozen times I was tempted to run on the bank so hard that it would take a month to get off, and thus put back the fatal moment. However, while I was thus vacillating our destination hove in sight, and I realized I was in for it. So with sinking heart I tied up the boat and watched the rest of the men file up the bank as happy as if they were going to a picnic."

The machine came to grief, and its occupants had to finish the journey on foot with "six young, husky, vigorous, savage bloodhounds." It was like this:

"In the party were Mr. Olcott, Miss Gauntier and the deputy sheriff—each with two dogs—and in one minute after hitting the ground the whole group was a hopeless tangle, Miss Gauntier in a hobble skirt being handicapped more than the others. However, after much effort, the procession was straightened out and the cavalcade took up the line of march, with the hounds straining at their leashes. About a mile of the road led through a swamp, where it became necessary to jump from hummock to hummock to keep out of the water. It was at this spot that things began to happen. Just as Mr. Olcott was jumping some four feet in order to reach a small dry spot, one of the dogs decided to investigate a trail he had scented about a hundred yards back, so without even a warning bark he started to the rear. Result—Mr. Olcott landed in a recumbent position in three feet of muddy water. Excited by the noise, the sheriff's dogs came up on the run, causing the worthy representative of the law to misjudge his leap and land on the back of Mr. Olcott's neck. After much thrashing about in the slime and water, they managed to reach land in such a condition it was hard to distinguish man from beast. An hour of wandering brought them to the road again. They joined us in a condition impossible to describe.

"Then we prepared to take the scene. While Mr. Olcott was 'making up,' the sheriff and I had a nice little heart-to-heart talk. He informed me casually that having traveled with Mr. Olcott, the dogs would not bother him at all, but would take up the strange scent—meaning me. Then I quietly sidled around to where the dogs were tied and tried to get real friendly with them until a savage growl put the director wise and he told me to beat it. Then I strolled off some distance and practiced hundred-yard dashes with a ball and chain fastened to my leg.

"Finally it was announced that everything was ready and we proceeded to the scene of the tragedy. We were to jump down from a locomotive, with a pursuing engine about twenty yards behind, and run and take refuge in a tree some distance away. I had already examined that tree and knew to a nicety in one-tenth of a second flat. The scene started—we jumped down and ran until we were outside the camera lines. There Olcott stopped. 'What's the matter?' I exclaimed. 'I want to see how they get out of that engine,' he said. 'Well, I'm not a bit curious, and, besides, I've a very important engagement over at that tree and, believe me, I'm going to keep it.' I grabbed up the ball and started as one of the hounds bayed on picking up the trail. Olcott had to come or be dragged, and as the ground was full of sandspurs he came. I was up in my perch in a fraction less than schedule time, but Sid in trying to follow slipped and slid, hanging head downward, his ankle being fastened to mine and I having a strangle hold on the branch that I did not propose losing. 'Come down,' he cried, 'so that I can get on my feet.' 'Nothing doing,' I returned; 'you just have a little talk with your friends the bloodhounds, until your friend the sheriff comes along and ties them up. You've traveled with them and they won't bother you.' And there he hung until these six canine Sherlock Holmses were corraled and tied together. Since then Mr. Olcott walks with a limp and every time I see a purp I have a quiet smile to myself."

MOVING PICTURE PERSONALITIES.

One of the best known moving picture men in the southern part of New Jersey is Edward J. O'Keefe, who has built up the City Square Theater into one of the model picture houses of the cast. Mr. O'Keefe came into motion pictures from the vaudeville stage, where he had made a great success of refined mimicry and character sketches. He has now been the manager of the City Square Theater for one year, celebrating his first anniversary in the new field on March 31st. He has arranged a very fine and costly celebration for this occasion. Mr. O'Keefe says that in learning the exhibiting profession he has been greatly aided by the Moving Picture World, which he thinks is indispensable to every man interested in motion pictures. Said Mr. O'Keefe to a World man:

"When I took hold I found things in pretty bad shape with very poor attendance. I immediately started a newspaper advertising crusade. Advertising every day in all three dailies and one Sunday paper. Put in a first class orchestra of four pieces. Went after the best pictures I could find. Billed a big feature every day. Mixed with my people and got their personal opinion. Talked to them frequently from stage in reference to coming attractions and also explained how remote was the fear of fire. Called their attention to the construction of building and the number of exits. Never allow any picture that could offend the most refined. Insist on the best of order at all times. Gave the newspapers to understand that if they wanted our business they would have to give us the same treatment as any other theater. Gave them to understand we were a first class theater even if we did run pictures. I feel safe in saying that two-thirds of our patrons who comprise the very best people in this town did not patronize any picture house this time a year ago. Give my personal attention to every detail of the house. Hard work, but hard work never killed any man if he takes good care of himself otherwise."

Edward J. O'Keefe.

HALLBERG ECONOMIZERS IN THANHOUSER STUDIO.

The Thanhouser Co. has equipped its studio with new motion picture machines, operating on alternating current with Hallberg Standard A. C. Economizers. Mr. Hallberg reports that Quirk's Theater, Fulton, N. Y., have just purchased through him a second Simplex M. P. Machine. Mr. Rufus A. Maltby of Middletown, N. Y., a Powers 6A with Hallberg A. C. Economizer; Weinberg & Mines, 500 Atlantic Ave., Brooklyn, N. Y., a Powers 6A.

"The Eye of a God" (Pyramid)

By George Blaisdell.

ONE more company is added to the many concerns contending for honors—and profits—in the fast expanding motion picture field. A three-reel debut is an unusual occurrence. It indicates confidence, at least—confidence in ability to satisfy a public every day becoming more discriminating in its judgment of pictures and consequently keener in detecting and commenting on shortcomings of writers, producers and actors.

Pyramid, which will release through Warner's Features, starts off well. It would be an overstatement to say that "The Eye of a God" is without noticeable blemish. Yet its faults are not glaring ones—by no means; they are of the minor sort and will not affect the pleasure or the interest of the average beholder. Chiefly, they are of omission—as, for instance, in the scene following the arrest of the forger, the daughter, visiting him in jail, finds him in stripes. His trial must have occurred, followed by his conviction. When the daughter goes to work as secretary for Hammond there is a typewriter in the office, but nothing to indicate that the girl knew anything of its manipulation. The employer is shown in love with her. The two are later settled down as man and wife, but the daughter never sat at her machine so far as the film shows. When the husband comes home and the wife admits him to her room the blackmailer steps behind the portieres. As the husband steps out of the camera, not out of the room, the ex-convict boldly reenters. The finger-print expert takes all his photographs in the evening. These are merely examples, and in view of the general quality of the work done there is no reason why they should not be avoided in future releases.

Scene from "The Eye of a God" (Pyramid).

There is a blackmailer in this story. His grip on his victim is made possible by the feminine fear of losing a husband's love through the uncovering of the crime of her father. It is one of those cases where any husband worthy of the name would without hesitation absolve his wife from any blame in a matter in which she is obviously blameless. Yet writers continually—and with justification, as proved by the public prints—portray the wife as "fleeing when no husband pursueth," if the paraphrasing may be permitted. Perhaps every adult who sees this picture will ask the question at the conclusion of the last scene: "Did she tell her husband that her father was a convict?"

The story from begining to end is crammed with incident—so much so that there is space here to refer to only a few of the more striking features. There is a thrilling escape from prison by the cellmate of the forger, the dead body of the latter being lifted from its rude box and the fleeing man being lightly nailed in, afterward breaking out when the wagon is conveying the coffin to the cemetery. This phase is reminiscent of a famous chapter of a well known French classic. There are good scenes in the reception at the home of Lawyer Hammond, in the rathskeller where the convict goes, in the frightening of the wife into giving up her great diamond called "The Eye of a God," in the investigations of the detective, in the discovery of the thief, in the chase of the motorcycle after the automobile resulting in disaster to the latter, and the thrilling leap of the convict and the pursuing detective over the cliff.

Mention must not be omitted of the good work of the entire cast. Especially notable is that of the woman who portrayed the wife. She wins your sympathy and holds it, and, if you think she is foolish for not telling all, the blame, of course, must rest on the head of the ingenious scenario writer. Much of the interest in the melodrama is due to the excellent work of the detective with his finger print demonstrations. It was not difficult to recognize here Chester Barnett. He has done no better work. Others deserving praise are the husband, the convict and the maid.

"The Eye of a God" will make good.

"THE JUDGE'S VINDICATION" (Reliance).

A coming two reel release by the Reliance Company, "The Judge's Vindication," tells the story of an honest judge who, by a just decision, excites the wrath of a group of financiers, called, in the picture, "the Trust." They have vainly tried to bribe him, so they now procure a trumped-up charge of bribery against him and, in this, it is claimed that the boodle was a lot of stock in the "Trust." Now, the judge has this stock and the "Trust" knows that he has paid for it. In the judge's trial, it becomes evident that no one else can testify that the stock was paid for, and of course, the "Trust" won't. But we soon find the pretty daughter of the judge appealing for help to a newspaper editor who assigns a reporter to the case. This reporter is a man of action and, when a little sleuthing proves not only that the "Trust" has the letters that would clear the judge, but that it is aiming to destroy them, he and the girl get the papers from the "Trust's" office at the point of a pistol. Then follows a race in an automobile to the Capitol, the clearing of the old man and the closing scenes, which are made to promise a love story.

Scene from "The Judge's Vindication" (Reliance).

The situation and its development in this picture hold strongly, although it cannot be said that it is all quite consistent or that as much as was possible has been made of it. Its interest comes from the fact that there is so much in it that is natural and in accord with what we all have read in newspaper accounts of political life. In other words, although it stumbles once or twice, it doesn't fall, and succeeds in telling a good story. This story, too, is pertinent. Another good asset that it has is the character of the judge, played by E. P. Sullivan. Perhaps the picture gets most of its value from this fine old man. All the later scenes, especially those approaching the thrilling climax, are exciting. In these scenes, Irving Cummings, as the reporter, and Mae Botti, as the girl, play the leads. The acting of nearly all the cast is commendable. The sets, backgrounds and photography are very good.

"BULGARIAN" IN FILMS FIRST.

Thanhouser beat the theatrical producers to it! Their Misses Snow and Anderson were seen in the all-fashionable "Bulgarian" gowns in the films, before the said "Bulgarian" was noticed on the stage, whose actresses are always keen to wear whatever bids to become the "style." Other smart and "correct" toilettes for 1913 noted in current Thanhousers are the imported Esponge, Faille, Shepherd Plaid and Parisian street costumes that have been worn by Flo La Badie, Jean Darnell, Grace Eline and Lila Chester. Dress is a detail they have come to pay attention to in the film producing business.

"The Wizard of the Jungle"

(World's Best Film Company).

THIS two-reel state right special, in which Captain Jack Bonavita is featured, will easily rank as one of the best of the so-called lion pictures which in these days are having so much vogue. The scene of the story is Africa. The Florida jungles make a convincing setting; there is plenty of realism in the way of backgrounds. With Harold Shaw taking care of the dramatic end of the story there was no room for doubt as to the outcome of the picture in this department. The result proves the wisdom of his selection. Joe Graybill, well known to picturegoers, has the part of Captain Hanscombe, the jealous army captain, who in the end meets his death in the jungle. Mr. Graybill is at his best in the portrayal of the jealous lover; he is so here. Nancy Avril sustains the role of the ward of Daniel Bonavita, the father of the young man on whom falls the mantle of the wizard of the jungle. Daniel is played by William Cavanaugh, and the part is well played, especially where Daniel is thrown from his horse. It is a nasty tumble—a spectacular one—and unusually realistic. Captain Jack faces the camera with the same unconcern he displays in facing wild beasts. Particularly does he not overact. King Baggot wrote the scenario.

The story is coherently told. There is a multiplicity of sub-titles, but their use is justified. The interest is established in the first thirty feet and is maintained steadily until the last scene. The best test of this is the apparent shortness of each reel. There are many exciting chases through the jungle which will serve to keep a house in suspense. It may be noted here that in all the two reels there is not a single case of double exposure. When a lion is facing a human being the two are before the camera simultaneously. If there are many thrills it must also be said that there is nothing gruesome in the picture, unless perhaps we may except the combat between Captain Hanscombe, lying on the ground, and with a club trying to keep a lion at bay, and the companion picture with the king of beasts leisurely eating a meal which seems to be particularly gratifying.

The story opens at the side of a new-made grave. Abdullah, the wizard of the jungle, receives the condolences of two natives over the death of his young son. The following scene shows the arrival of a party of lion hunters. The head of the party, Daniel Bonavita, reprimands the wizard for bringing liquor into the wilds. Young Jack Bonavita is taught to handle firearms. The wizard incites the natives to rebel, and the camp of the white men is attacked by a large party of blacks. There is an exciting running fight through the forest. Young Jack, left behind in camp, is struck by a poisoned spear and goes in search of his father. He is lost in the jungle, and when about to be devoured by a lion is saved by the wizard. Abdullah, in order to save the boy's life, amputates his arm. The father, unable to find his son, believes him destroyed and returns to England. Abdullah adopts Jack, through love for the son he has lost. He teaches the younster the secrets of the forest and especially how to handle wild animals.

Twenty years later, Daniel Bonavita stops at an army post in Africa. With him is his young ward, Pearl. Young Jack, grown to manhood, rescues the girl when she is assailed by a lion. Captain Hanscombe, an officer at the post, makes love to Pearl, but his attentions are unwelcome. The girl is interested in the young wizard, who on the death of Abdullah, has taken his place in the forest. She teaches Jack and helps him in studying. As Pearl returns from one of these excursions she is met by the captain, who embraces her. Jack throws the soldier to the ground. Later Hanscombe orders the arrest of Jack, and goes into the jungle to see that his order is carried out. Jack is arrested, but the captain it attacked and killed by a lion. As the young wizard is brought into camp he is presented to Daniel Bonavita by Pearl. While he is thanking the young man for his kindness to his ward, Daniel recognizes in the man under arrest his own son. There is a happy reunion, and indications point to another union between Jack and Pearl.

Newman Company Equips Empress Theater, Chicago.

The Newman Manufacturing Company, of Cincinnati, Ohio, and 101 Fourth Ave., New York City, reports that it has just furnished the two Chicago theaters controlled by the Sullivan & Considine Company—the new Empress on Halsted St., and the Empress on Cottage Grove Ave.—with brass frames and rail work. The Newman Company has just issued a new catalog showing brass frames and easels, German silver frames and oxidized frames and brass rail work, and brass work of every description, which can be had upon request.

Famous Players Contemplates Educationals.

FOLLOWING the announcement that the Famous Players' Film Company had purchased the sole rights to the Cherry Kearton series of wild life and big game in the jungle, Adolph Zukor, president of that company, informs the Moving Picture World that he is considering a definite plan for the production of a series of educational pictures suitable for use in public schools and other institutions of learning. The Kearton pictures alone cover a wide range of natural history. To this it is Mr. Zukor's purpose to add more of the same character. He will also extend the work to other scientific subjects.

In conversation with Mr. Zukor during a recent visit which he paid the World staff, he spoke of a most ambitious plan to be carried out in connection with the several departments of the United States Government at Washington.

"Every American citizen is interested in the manner in which the business of our great country is conducted," said Mr. Zukor in introducing the subject. "We see men spending their lifetime of service in the employ of the Government at a rate of remuneration far less than they could obtain in almost any other sphere of activity and with almost no consideration from the public which they serve. It has been in my mind to show to the great American public, by means of pictures, just what the servants of the people are doing in Washington."

Mr. Adolph Zukor.

Mr. Zukor is very likely to succeed in this undertaking, because he seems to have the "get there" qualities in his make-up. He was the first to secure for motion pictures a real co-operation of the best talent in the field of legitimate drama, and the success of the combination of a Frohman and a Hackett has encouraged other large theatrical producing interests to enter the realm of the pictured drama. In this he was the pioneer who blazed the trail, for it was his business accumen and persuasiveness that made the Famous Players a reality. His ability and persistence should win success for him in other ventures.

Music for the Picture

BY CLARENCE E. SINN

THE following was crowded out of my last letter through lack of space: "Dear Sir: I always find your articles and department in general a great help in settling the question, 'What shall I play for the picture.' Even though I know for a certainty that three-fourths of the patrons of our theater are utterly oblivious to the music, for the other fourth, I feature every possible situation and climax in each picture as much for my own satisfaction as anything else.

"I agree with Miss Ditmar, in the February 1st number, in regard to opera selections; they are my especial hobby. I might suggest that in addition to those Miss Ditmar cites, the most of which I have used to advantage, the following are equally excellent: 'Little Boy Blue, Rose Maid, Spring Maid, The Firefly, The Love Cure, Oh, Oh, Delphine, Under Many Flags, Hanky Panky, Count of Luxembourg, He Came From Milwaukee, Mlle. Modiste, Lady of the Slipper, and The Red Rose. Also the overtures, "Pique Dame, Jolly Robbers, La Boheme, and Madame Butterfly.' Fraternally, G. Warner Metcalfe, Grand Theater, Holyoke, Mass."

Mr. Metcalfe says that though a majority of his audience may be oblivious to the music, he plays for the minority as well as for his own satisfaction. This is the right spirit. But very often a great part of the oblivious majority may sense the fitness of the musical accompaniment without being aware of it. Anyhow it is pretty generally understood that the music should never be so prominent as to detract from the picture, but should at all times be made subserviant to it. For that reason many patrons may not always notice the music in particular unless there is something wrong with it. And, after all, a musician's greatest satisfaction is found in his own approval of his work.

Organists, of whom the number employed in moving picture theaters is constantly increasing, will be delighted with the new book of organ music published by Meyer & Bro., 77 W. Washington Street, Chicago, Ill. I have examined this book and can vouch for the excellent quality of its musical contents and their adaptability to moving picture work.

The militant spirit seemed to predominate among the feature films viewed last week. Here are suggestions for music to three most excellent war pictures—every one a feature:

"THE WOE OF BATTLE" (Kalem).

4. Short march until title: "A Broken Heart."
5. Pathetic music for one scene.
6. Long heavy, hurry (for battle) until hospital scene.

8. March, until end of picture.

BUSTER'S SISTER.

"Buster," more properly known as Roswell Johnson, of the Lubin company, has a sister. His father, also Roswell, has a daughter (very naturally) and she is to be called Ormi Hawley Johnson, to further add to the confusion. Ever since Buster was added to the Lubin staff there have been questions innumerable as to whether "Buster" was Arthur Johnson's son, though Raymond and Alfred Hackett, who really are the Johnson offspring, never are linked up with their better-known father. To head off any questions as to whether Ormi Hawley Johnson is the son of Arthur Johnson and Ormi Hawley, be it said at once that she is the daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Roswell Johnson and that Mrs. Johnson is not Miss Hawley. Johnson turns the camera for George O. Nicholls, who directs the Hawley section of the Lubin company. That's why.

HALLBERG ESTABLISHING AGENCIES.

Mr. M. L. Livingston, sales representative for J. H. Hallberg "The Economizer Man" left for a trip to Chicago on Tuesday of this week, calling at several of the towns enroute going and coming. The purpose of the trip is to close pending deals on Economizers, and to establish dealers agencies for Powers, Simplex and Motiograph moving picture machines, as well as for the Hallberg Specialties.

Among the Picture Theaters

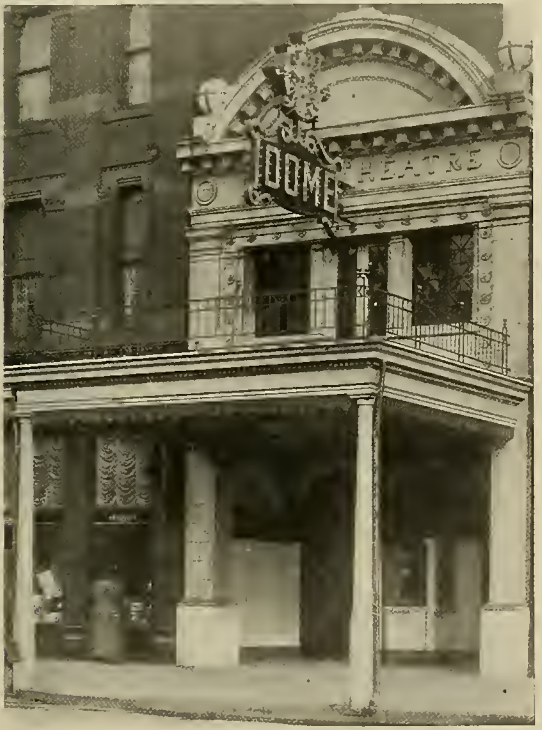
DOME THEATER, YOUNGSTOWN, OHIO.

THE Dome Theater, of which we publish two excellent photo-engravings, one giving a view of the front elevation and the other a view of the interior, gives the reader a concrete conception of the "picture theater beautiful." It is owned by Messrs. Renner & Deibel, men who can see big returns from a first-class picture house. The place is managed by C. W. Deibel, who opened it on the evening of Saturday, December 21, 1912. From its opening date to this day, the business of this expensive picture house has been more than the proprietors anticipated.

The auditorium, which provides opera chairs for 800 persons, is finished along lines that combine simplicity with a magnitude of size and space which are seldom to be found in the average picture theater. From any seat on the sloping floors, one can obtain a full view of the screen and stage.



Dome Theater.

Patrons are enabled to enter and leave any part of the auditorium at any time without inconveniencing in the least degree those seated about them. The exits on the Hazel Street side are large double doors that open directly to the street; the west side exits, which are of the same commodious character, lead to a fireproof foyer which furnishes an unobstructed passage to Federal Street, parallel with the main entrance. There is a handsome marquee extending for some distance over the sidewalk of the Federal Street entrance.

Brilliant with electrio lights, it heralds a welcome to the palatial foyer and lobby. The sides of the lobby are covered with polished marble, which half way to the top meets a series of mural panels that shade in quiet tints with the ceiling which is studded with inverted lights casting their radiance towards the ceiling. The floor of the lobby is done in mosaic style.

The operating room is constructed of fireproof material and has three operating machines in constant use. The picture is projected upon a mirror screen which the manager says is the largest in the State. The ventilation of the theater has been made the subject of careful study by the proprietors which resulted in a system almost incomparable. Music is furnished by a nine-piece orchestra.

HUBIN'S THEATER, PLEASANTVILLE, N. J.

We print herewith a cut of Hubin's Theater, Pleasantville, N. J., owned and built by Frank B. Hubin at a cost of $25,000. It has a frontage of thirty-one feet and a depth of one hundred feet. It seats 625. The house is built of fireproof material, and is one of the best equipped moving picture houses in the State of New Jersey. Although Pleasantville is not a large town, the theater's patronage is not confined to that place, but it draws from neighboring towns, even from Atlantic City. Mr. Hubin says that he draws his patronage from about 25,000 people.

QUIMBY'S $60,000 EXCLUSIVE PICTURE HOUSE.

The following excerpt is from a letter of W. C. Quimby: "If any dubious person should doubt that money invested in a comfortable, sanitary and fireproof moving picture theater for the exclusive presentation of photoplays is not a good investment, he ought to visit Zanesville, Ohio, and look over my new $60,000 moving picture theater." Judging from the number of beautiful photographs illustrative of interior and exterior views which Mr. Quimby has sent us, it looks as though Mr. Quimby had spent over twice the amount that he says he has, and they further point out the fact that Mr. Quimby's faith in the stability of the picture business is anything but weak. Owing to lack of space we are unable to publish but one photograph of Mr. Quimby's $60,000 photoplay palace.

The plot of ground upon which the structure stands has a frontage of 70 feet and a depth of 132 feet. It is modern in every respect and is built of fireproof material throughout. Nothing has been left undone for the benefit of patrons in the way of convenience. Mr. Quimby opened his new house around the first of June, 1912, and has been playing to crowded houses ever since. He has turned crowds away in the summer and is doing it yet. People from neighboring towns come to his house in automobiles. It has a seating capacity of 750 persons.

The lobby is beautifully lighted and standing in conspicuous places are neatly framed posters of the pictures constituting the day's programme. There are check rooms for women's and men's garments, wraps, etc. The checking system of the house is so perfect that a man may have his cigar checked and get it back in good condition when the entertainment is over. The ushers and attendants are examples of refined etiquette and neatness of appearance. As one sits in the luxurious leather opera chairs watching the pictures, he breaths nothing but the purest of air, for the ventilating apparatus of the theater is perfect. It is cool in the summer and the right temperature of warmth permeates the place in the winter.

In justice to Mr. Quimby's excellent management, a word ought to be said of the music which he gives to his patrons When the theater was built he installed a $4,500 Wurlitzer Unit orchestra. After using this instrument for about six months, Mr. Quimby was so well pleased with it that as a Christmas present to his patrons he bought and installed a $3,500 pipe organ. These instruments are played by a competent musician, and the audiences express great satisfaction over the music. Mr. Quimby has recently installed his own electric light plant, which is saving him about $150 a month. He was compelled to do this on account of the exorbitant rates charged by local lighting companies. Mr. Quimby is also the owner of other large houses playing to vaudeville and moving pictures. The admission prices to the new house are five and ten cents.

Geo. Grossmith and Mr. Ed. Payne, actors well known to the states, have at last submitted to the camera and have been filmed in their very successful musical comedy, "Our Miss Gibbs," produced by a London company.

MORRIS GRAND THEATER, HOT SPRINGS, S. D.

The half-tone engravings accompanying this article are views of the Morris Grand Theater, Hot Springs, S. D. The house is owned and managed by Morris Block, one of the most enterprising and hustling exhibitors in the Western country. Hot Springs is a town with a population of about 2,500 and to have a $15,000 theater as the Morris Grand is going some. We are skeptical as to whether or not there is another town of its size which has such an expensive photoplay house.

Mr. Block says his theater is a paying investment even though it is built in such a small town. "Although Hot Springs is a small town, it is by no means 'dead,'" says Mr Block. "It is one of the liveliest places in the Black Hills The local lodge of Odd Fellows recently attended the International Convention at Winnipeg, Manitoba, Canada, and won a prize for being one of the best drilled Odd Fellow teams attending the convention. A thousand-foot reel of the Odd Fellows' parade at Winnipeg was taken and I immediately secured a copy of it.

At the Sign of the Flaming Arcs

By George Blaisdell.

THE work of Phillips Smalley and Lois Weber of the Rex Company, is attracting attention. In the first place, there is behind their acting always a story; and it is of the peculiar quality that first gave the Rex Company fame among screen followers. The reason for this is simple. The source of their stories now finding favor is the same as was the source of the earlier ones—in other words, in the fertile brain of Lois Weber. The author in this instance has no occasion to complain of an unappreciative director, of a script so mauled and mangled as to make the finished picture unrecognizable to the eye of its creator. Mr. Smalley and Miss Weber not only portray the leading characters; they direct the work of the entire cast. These two players are giving much attention to two-reel subjects, and with marked success.

Lois Weber in "Until Death."

Miss Weber is at her best in the role of the young matron—the womanly woman who makes the home. She radiates domesticity. In one of her plays, shortly to be released, there is a striking instance of this. "Bobbie's Baby" is the title. The mother has lost her only child. The empty cradle stands in its old place of honor. The husband and wife, driving in an automobile through the suburbs, leave the machine for a stroll. They hear the cry of an infant; the wail comes from a barn. The little one is taken home; it is bathed and cared for. Sitting in the lap of the nurse of the baby that is gone is the new-comer, sans clothes. The wife is looking into its face, laughing, crooning. The same cradle, now about to have another occupant, is hard by. The sunlight floods a scene that will strike home to every one who has ever loved a baby.

The filming of Miss Weber's latest story, a double tragedy, "Until Death," in two reels, very nearly resulted in the death of Harry Pollard, playing one of the three principal parts. In making a fall over a cliff Mr. Pollard received a blow over the heart. Development of the film indicated the necessity of a retake. Following this scene Mr. Pollard had to be buried in a supposed landslide, with only a hand and arm above ground. When he was lifted out, after a rehearsal and the taking of four scenes, he was more dead than alive. If one may judge from a synopsis of the picture, the climax will be as thrilling as it is dramatic.

Did you see Florence Lawrence in Kinemacolor? To be sure, it was only for a minute, but it was worth while. The popular screen girl was cornered by the cameraman during the great suffragette parade in Washington on March 3. The fact that she was mounted on a high-spirited charger did not in the least diminish the force and extent of the old familiar, ever charming smile.

In a letter to a friend in this city Edwin August says he is hard at work at the Vitagraph studio at Santa Monica. He is under the direction of Rollin S. Sturgeon. It is no hazard to say that the combination of these two men will result in really fine stuff.

The decision of the Vitagraph company to put Robert Thornby, of the Western studio, at the head of a comedy crew is a cause for congratulation. Those who have seen Mr. Thornby in comedy will understand why. His recent appearance in the guise of a tramp was a fine bit of character portrayal.

The action of the Biograph company in supplying to licensed exhibitors the grouped and identified photographs of its principal players will be heartily appreciated by thousands of picture followers. It is to be regretted that in the center of this group there could not have been placed the likeness of the one man to whom not only is due whatever individual distinction Biograph pictures possess, but to whom also, for his splendid and artistic services to the silent drama, present and coming generations of picturegoers will have cause for gratitude—Director Griffith.

Now that the newspapers of the country are devoting space to motion picture "news" we may expect to find statements that really are new. The Omaha World-Herald of March 2 in a sketch of "Jean" Fearnley, says that from the stage she "graduated to the motion picture platform, beginning with the Reliance company, where for the past year she has been playing leads with King Baggot." Miss Jane Fearnley is playing leads with William Shay in Mr. Brenon's Imp company. Aside from these minor inaccuracies the item seems to be nearly right. On the same page G. M. Anderson is described as a cow-puncher and horseman on the Western ranges in mere boyhood. There are men in the East who are under the impression that "Broncho Billy" acquired his knowledge of horsemanship after he had attained to man's estate. Some of the syndicated "bunk" that is being spread broadcast will stand trimming.

The admirers of "Little Mary" received a pleasant surprise in the Biograph release of March 15—"The Unwelcome Guest"—in which this popular actress appeared. It is said that this picture, which was made last summer, has been withheld from the market in the hope that it might be used as the first of a series. The success of Miss Pickford in "The Good Little Devil" has been so marked, however, that it has practically precluded the possibility of her return to the screen.

Marcus Loew has added another theater to his New York string—this time the biggest of the lot. It is the Broadway, at Forty-first Street, for years the home of big dramatic productions. Five and six reels of first run pictures will be shown daily. There will be three singers—good ones. An orchestra under the direction of Ernest Luz will pay particular attention to "playing the pictures," beginning at 1.30 p m. The prices of admission will be 10 and 15 cents in the daytime, advancing to 25 cents as the maximum in the evening. There are 1,900 seats. Joe S. Engel, an old theatrical man and showman, is the manager. He has been with Mr. Loew for several years. It was in 1899 that Mr. Engel showed the first moving pictures in Cuba—and under a tent. In those days when traveling in smaller communities, Mr. Engel said on Monday, it was necessary to carry 4,000 pounds of baggage in order to project a twelve-foot picture. The Broadway will show its first picture at 10 o'clock each forenoon. There was a good attendance on its opening day. And still the old line theaters continue to come into the kinematographic fold!

Flickers.

I WOULD like to introduce to you this week one of the oldest young men in the business, Tom Evans. He is standing there as though he would like to say something to you, but I won't let him. He can smile all he wants to, but that's all. In fact, he wouldn't look natural if he didn't smile. That is the reason we all like him. Though still a young man under the thirty-year mark, Tom has accomplished a great deal. He was first identified with the Pantograph Corporation (a company which has long since gone to rest) as secretary and treasurer. Later he joined A. G. Whyte, when that party was "Sole Agent" for the independent manufacturers, and managed the Western affairs of the company. At the formation of the Sales Company, P. A. Powers secured his services, and soon after made him general manager of the Powers Picture Plays. When the Universal Film Manufacturing Co. entered the field and bought over the Powers Co., Tom was figured in on the deal and was later transferred to Fort Lee to manage the Universal productions made at the Champion studio. Do you blame him for wearing the happy expression? The only time that he looks real cross is when some one tells him that they drive a faster car than he does. Then you have to show him. I dare you to take him up.

Mr. Tom Evans.

While blowing up a ship for the pictures, Mr. Herbert Blache was severely burned by a premature explosion of a keg of gun-powder. Though painfully burned about the head and arms, and now confined to his bed, the doctor's last report is very satisfactory, and we hope to see him, well and about in a short time.

Instead of going to Norfolk, Va., Mr. Jack Warner is going to Europe to represent Warner's Features. We have had no word as yet from Sam Warner, who left New York some time ago for the same place.

They say that Joe (Babe) Farnum has resigned from the Film Supply Co. to accept the American representation of the British American Film Co.

Owing to the volume of business now being enjoyed by the Ambrosio Film Co., they found their offices too small, and are now occupying larger and more sumptuous quarters in the same building. The feature of their new home is the large and comfortable projecting room.

I was entertained by T. D. Cochrane at the Lubin plant in Philadelphia, one day last week, and during the trip around the studio was pleasantly surprised by meeting Miss Isabel Lamon and Vivian Prescott, of the Eclair and Imp companies respectively, who have recently joined the Lubin stock company. MAY BUCKLEY WITH SELIG.

May Buckley, a clever actress, who has had a distinguished career on the dramatic stage and who was for a time with the Lubin Company, has joined the Selig players to appear in a series of elaborate productions at the big Chicago studio.

FULLER HAS STATE RIGHTS.

Charles L. Fuller, well known in the motion picture business all over the country, has secured the State rights of the Helen Gardner "Cleopatra" pictures for the State of New York.

"CYMBELINE," (Thanhouser).

This two-reel production of the Shakespearean play, "Cymbeline," taken in California, shows a praiseworthy ambition on the part of the producer. "Cymbeline" is singularly well adapted to rendition in motion pictures, and the director has presented some of the dramatic moments in the play with a fair degree of success. Much pains was evidently taken in a laudable endeavor to be correct in historic details. The scene in Rome where the wager is made between Leonatus and Iachimo to test the fidelity of Imogen was rendered not without skill. Another scene deserving of some praise is the entrance of Iachimo into the bed chamber of Imogen. The situation is handled with great delicacy and follows the spirit of the Shakespearean play. The groupings in the scenes showing the court of Cymbeline seem to lack artistic arrangement. Skilful handling of large groups before the camera is a great art, the lack of which has an ill effect upon the eye. Some of the outdoor settings are beautiful, but in one of them the obtrusion of a decidedly modern house tends to destroy the illusion. On the whole I think that this feature ought to be acceptable to the average motion picture audience, and the producer deserves very great credit for seeking to aim high. Such pictures, though there may be blemishes in the execution, strengthen our hope in the future of kinematography.

"HIAWATHA" AT AMERICAN MUSEUM.

The American Museum of Natural History and The Society for Scenic and Historic Preservation have arranged with Mr. F. E. Moore for the presentation of the picture-masque "Hiawatha" the evening of April third at the Museum. Authorities consider Mr. Moore's work invaluable because he preserves in the pictures some of the most ancient rites and ceremonies of the Indians, and at the same time gives the American people a new viewpoint regarding the Red Men. Mr. Moore began his work at Lake Chautauqua in 1906, using Longfellow's poem as the basis. The following year with the assistance of Mr. R. S. Pigott, then a member of the faculty of Toronto University, the Elizabethan Masque was adopted as the best vehicle, Mr. Pigott acting as choragus and reciting the poem while the Indian Players gave the dramatic action. Season after season this Indian Passion Play has been given wherever suitable settings could be found for it, and finally Mr. Moore yielding to the pressure of those most interested in the Indians consented to have photographs made of the play, and with Mr. Pigott reciting the poem, they will projected as above stated. Admission is by invitation.

"HER BIG STORY" NEWSPAPER PLAY TO BE RELEASED WITH MAGAZINE ISSUE CONTAINING STORY.

"Her Big Story" is the title of a two-reel subject which the American Film Mfg. Co. has just completed at its Western studio. This story was purchased from the Street & Smith Publishing Co., and will be released by the American on or close to the date of its appearance in the Popular Magazine. This general plan will be followed by the "Flying A" forces in similar cases.

Manufacturers Advance Notes

"THE GRAFTERS" (Reliance).

Cleverly handled by a capable cast of actors and produced under the able direction of Frederick Sullivan, this photoplay proves a strong and telling drama.

Edna, engaged to her employer, John Duncan, is anxious that he get his bid on a large contract for street work in at the City Hall on time. His political friends, afraid that his bid will be lower than theirs, deceive him as to the time for them to be in. So he leaves his office in Edna's care while he goes out to attend to some business, promising to be back in time to get to the City Hall by four. While he is gone, Edna reads in the paper that 3 o'clock is the appointed hour and knowing that John will not be back she prepares his bid and rushes to the City Hall with it, dragging a young reporter friend with her. She pushes her way by the Supervisors and entering the contract chamber, she demands they accept her bid.

Scene from "The Grafters" (Reliance).

The politicians attempt to refuse the bid, claiming she is too late. But she insists that it is not 3 o'clock yet and that if they do not take it, she and the reporter will prepare a fine little article on the city's graft. An elderly man, listening to her story, sees the time is not up and demands a reading of the girl's bid. The great discrepancy in the price of his bid and the others' wins John Duncan the contract, to his surprise and Edna's joy.

The cast includes Edna Cunningham, as the pretty stenographer; Henry Francis Koser, as John Duncan, and Harry Spengler in the role of the young reporter.

SPECIAL MUSIC AND ADVERTISING FOR "HIAWATHA."

Mr. Moore, having spared no expense in getting the pictures of Hiawatha, has carried out the same policy in getting such accessories as advertising material and music. For his posters, he had a well-known artist make sketches direct from the Indians, and these have been reproduced in colors. For his music he selected John J. Braham, who did the music for the Liebler production of "The Renegade." Mr. Braham has taken Ojibway and Iroquois melodies and arranged them without destroying their Indian characteristics, scoring them for orchestra, and also making a piano arrangement for theaters without orchestra. Mr. Braham has been especially successful in catching the spirit of the dances, particularly the Beggar's Dance. If this number were published separately it would soon have a great vogue in the cabarets. Another charming number, an intermezzo, Minnehaha, was inspired both by the lines:

"With her moods of shade and sunshine,"

"PETE, THE ARTIST" (Lubin).

This is essentially a comedy picture in which Peter Lang and Mrs. Geo. W. Walters may be called the stars. Doubtless it is very funny, for the prime situation is excruciating. It is one of the Barry O'Neil's productions. The cast includes the best players of his company. As a big laugh it must be a success.

Pete Brevardo has a reputation as a portrait painter. On the street he encounters an elderly maiden lady. Belle Ritter and her aristocratic face impresses him powerfully, so much so that he thinks that if opportunity occurred he could make a masterpiece. The opportunity came quickly for the lady visits his studio, desiring that Pete shall paint her picture. The work is a joy to the artist and he carefully hides the painting until finished, when he will exhibit it on visitors' day at his studio. Preparing for the exhibition, Mary, the stupid old housecleaner, disarranges the several paintings and in place of Miss Ritter's portrait she places another. When Pete with much pride and acclaim unveils the supposed masterpiece, Miss Ritter and the visitors discover a scrawny old maid nursing a cat. There is a panic, the guests scream and disperse in disorder. Belle faints and is finally taken home by her ward, Rita. Pete, however, hastens to the house with the work of art, and in short order there are signs of wedding bells.

Scene from "Pete, the Artist" (Lubin).

ATTRACTIVE SCENIC SUBJECT.

The Great Northern Film Company is priding itself on the scenic subject which is to be released on March 22nd, in conjunction with "The New Film Actor." It is entitled, "The Port of Copenhagen" and will prove one of the most interesting of the scenic subjects which have been presented of late by this company. Beautiful views are given of the habor of Copenhagen and its commercial activities and in addition the cameraman was fortunate enough to "snap" the warships of four nations. England, Russia, Denmark and the United States are represented in the picture and the ships are seen in all their glory of bunting and full dress. The firing of the salute of welcome by the Danish warships is a particularly interesting view and the entry of the American warships into the harbor is calculated to prove an inspiring sight. But aside from the warships, the picture is replete with interest because of the fact that it shows vividly all the points of interest about the harbor of Copenhagen. One of the most thrilling incidents of the film is a storm of thunder and lightning over the harbor. The forts, the docks, the ferries, the shipbuilding plants and dry docks are passed in panoramic view before the beholder and the harbor by moonlight is calculated to prove a revelation to lovers of motion photography.

CHARLES R. HOLMES' BUDGET.

Here is some more fan-news from Charles R. Holmes, who writes that he is going down to Los Angeles presently to clean up what has been overlooked in that section.

G. M. Anderson is easing up in his work now that Augustus Carney is back and, while Alkali Ike is hustling to catch up on his Western releases, Broncho Billy is over in San Francisco superintending the details of his new picture theater.

Miss Gladys Fields has rejoined the Essanay company, but will work in the Mackley company in Los Angeles instead of opposite G. M. Anderson. Her first release was "A Montana Mix-Up," March 6.

Joseph Waldron, formerly with Nestor, who more recently has been running a small-time booking agency in Los Angeles, has gone East in connection with a legacy from his father, recently deceased.

Jack Conway, after several months in stock work in San Francisco, is back with Nestor as a leading man.

SIMONE REVIVES CENTAUR.

The old Centaur Picture Company, organized several years ago and conducted for some time by David Horsley before he inaugurated the Nestor brand, has been resurrected by Charles Simone. The Centaur Company was the first independent film company organized and had a rather checkered career, but finally emerged and was very successful toward the last. Mr. Simone was connected with Mr. Horsley in the Nestor Company for some time and was lastly manager of the Victor Company for the Universal, but resigned after the unpleasantness in which that company was involved.

The New Centaur Company is located at 682 Avenue E, Bayonne, N. J., and Charles Simone is its general manager. For the present the plant will be used for laboratory work, but Mr. Simone expects to go into producing later.

HUNTING BIG GAME IN THE ARCTIC.

Northern Ventures, Limited, report a brisk demand for their five reel feature, and negotiations are pending for the sale of exclusive rights on a large number of states and much foreign territory.

The five reels which were selected from over 20,000 feet of negative, is the result of two separate expeditions to the Far North. Early in May, 1912, Harry Whitney, the famous explorer, left St. John's, N. F., on a big game hunting trip. Later in the same year "Lucky" Scott headed another expedition to North Baffin Land, their object being to locate reported placer gold discoveries at Salmon River, a tributary of Pond's Inlet. A motion picture photographer accompanied both expeditions, and the two series, now condensed into five reels, present in remarkable detail the animal and Eskimo life of the great frozen regions.

The series includes views of polar bear and seal hunts, the farthest north Eskimo settlements, pictures of a most remarkable Arctic snowstorm, and views of some wonderful icebergs, several of which exceed 350 feet in height and had a water line of nearly a mile.

Northern Ventures, Limited, hope within a week or so to announce that these pictures will be run in a Broadway house. The series will be shown at Massey Hall, Toronto, for one week, commencing April 5th. Dr. J. G. Knowlton, physician on the "Lucky" Scott expedition, is scheduled as lecturer.

TWO LUBIN ARABIANS.

Recently the two sections of the Lubin company working in Jacksonville under Arthur D. Hotaling and George O. Nicholls were consolidated for a couple of weeks, and while Mr. Hotaling came North to make arrangements for a series of unique comedies and farces, Mr. Nicholls took the two sections to St. Augustine where two Arabian subjects were made under his direction. The first of these will be released March 31st, under the title, "Women of the Desert." The cut on this page shows a portion of the merged companies lunching on the sands after working some of the exterior scenes in this picture. Director Nicholls carries his insigna of office, the megaphone, and the fans will recognize Miss Ormi Hawley, Edwin Carewe, Earl Metcalfe, Miss Frances Nemoyer, her sister Marguerite, Walter Stull, George Reehm, Irving White and other favorites.

MAKING THE BRASS RAILING.

Almost everyone will be interested in the operation of a large brass manufacturing plant where the various processes incident to the manufacture of the brass work from which the highly polished railing seen in high class theaters is formed. The raw material is received in ingots and cast into proper form in the foundry. From the foundry the castings go to the machine shop for the finishing processes, being turned and drilled and machined as required. Brass and copper rod, tubing and sheet material is passed through the cutting department and machine shop, where the manufacturing process is completed, and all is sent to the polishing department where the parts are smoothed and polished. Then there is the plating room in which the dull brass, antique and oxidized copper, nickel plate and old gold effects are produced. After all these processes have been completed the goods are ready for shipment. A visit to the factory of the McKenna Bros. Brass Company, of Pittsburgh, Pa., would be an interesting one, because there all the various processes of manufacturing railings, grills and other special brass work used for building purposes may be seen. Something of the excellence of the product of this company many of our readers already know. More information may be obtained by addressing the company.

KINEMACOLOR DOES "FEATHERTOP."

A remarkable photoplay has been taken by Kinemacolor, adapted from Nathaniel Hawthorne's well-known story of "Feathertop." An old witch makes a scarecrow; with the help of the devil she endows this creature with life, and sends it forth to woo the daughter of her bitter enemy. Later Feathertop sees in the mirror not the reflection of the man she thinks him, but the thing he really is. Love makes him a man for the moment.

Feathertop rushes to his creator, refuses longer to smoke the enchanted pipe which kept him alive, and falls at the feet of the witch, a heap of sticks and straw with a pumpkin head. A beautiful finish to the picture shows a cornfield with the scarecrow silhouetted against a gorgeous sunset sky.

A THRILLER FROM BUFFALO.

The Buffalo Feature Film Co. has opened offices at 611 Mutual Life Building, Buffalo, N. Y., and is prepared to furnish money getting features at all times. "From Sing Sing to Liberty; or, The Lawyer, the Valet and the Millionaire," has been secured for New York State and Western Pennsylvania exclusively by this exchange. It is a three-reel feature with a good line of paper and advertising novelties.

MOVING PICTURE MACHINE FOR HAITI.

Mr. H. Arnous, of Port au Prince, Haiti, has just purchased from J. H. Hallberg, "The Economizer Man," a complete moving picture machine with full equipment of supplies. Mr. Hallberg also reports the sale of a Power's No. 6A with Hallberg A. C. Economizer to S. Manheimer, Bath Beach; also a Power's No. 6A to James Hamilton of Philadelphia.

CORBETT BOOSTING MOTIOGRAPH.

We are printing herewith photograph of Mr. Bernard M. Corbett, for a number of years demonstrating salesman for the Thomas A. Edison, Inc., but who recently has signed on as a traveling demonstrating salesman for the Motiograph, which is manufactured by the Enterprise Optical Mfg. Company, of Chicago.

Bernard M. Corbett.

Mr. Corbett is going to share the Eastern territory with Mr. Fred A. Clark, who has been with the Motiograph people for the past two and one-half years, and both Mr. Clark and Mr. Corbett will make their headquarters with the New York office of this well-known machine, at 30 East 23rd Street.

Mr. Corbett is a member of the I. A. T. S. E., Boston Local, and in addition is a member of the Winthrop Lodge No. 1078 of the Elks, and numbers among his friends many of the old guard in the picture business, he, himself, having been in the game for a great many years, and having worked up to his present position from that of operator in the New England theaters.

Before signing on with the Enterprise Optical Mfg. Company, Mr. Corbett had been offered a position with the American Talking Picture Machine Company of New York, but, for reasons of his own, preferred to take up the sale of the Motiograph machine in the Eastern territory.

"PRISONER OF ZENDA" PURCHASERS.

The Interstate Feature Film, 1202 North Gay Street, Baltimore, has purchased state rights for "The Prisoner of Zenda," from the Famous Players Film Company for Delaware, Maryland, District of Columbia and West Virginia. They report an encouraging number of requests for booking. Mr. George M. Krupa, with offices at the Hippodrome Theater, Lancaster, Pa., has purchased the state rights for this production for Pennsylvania. A significant factor in connection with the Famous Players' current release is the general satisfaction evidenced by state right buyers, no doubt the cause of the unprecedented demand apparent for this film It is doubtful whether any other film of the magnitude of "The Prisoner of Zenda" has had such rapid disposition among state right buyers, and the fact speaks at once for the confidence in the Famous Players product and the enterprise of discerning state right buyers.

SHERRY CO. HAS "ZENDA" FOR NEW YORK.

The William L. Sherry Feature Film Company, Inc., the offices of which are in Suite 301, Times Building, New York City, has secured from the Famous Players Film Company the New York State and City rights for the great four-part production "The Prisoner of Zenda," featuring James K. Hackett in the dual roles of the King of Ruritania and Rudolf Rassendyl. The picture opened at Marcus Loew's theaters in New York City for an indefinite period beginning March 24th. Those desiring bookings should make early application at the offices of the Sherry company. There is a full line of paper for this production, including heralds, photos and lobby displays in keeping with the character of this masterpiece.

"A WOLF AMONG LAMBS" (Essanay).

The stage settings in this feature are remarkable. The greatest of care and artistic taste was used to get the effects quite naturally.

Don Fernando, smitten with Giulia, a Spanish dancer, persuades the young and innocent girl to run away with him. Valeska, the sister, finds a note on the table the following morning, telling her that Giulia has gone, never to return. Months later, however; Giulia returns to her home, having been deserted by her unfaithful lover. Giulia enters the convent. The sister meets Don Fernando some time later. He tries to influence the girl to marry him. Don Fernando's life is saved by Sister Valencia. who interferes just as Valeska is about to stab the villain. Valeska is later thrown into a dungeon by Fernando, who declares he will "have her." The pretty Spanish girl does not stay in her prison long. Sister Valencia, discovering Valeska's whereabouts, gets her out of her prison in a clever way. Valeska then enters the convent, where her sister is overjoyed at the happy meeting—and ending. Don Fernando repents for his wrongdoing and prays on his knees at the door of the holy convent for forgiveness.

Scene from "A Wolf Among Lambs" (Essanay).

Dolores Cassinelli, as Giulia, plays the charming and lovable character in a true to life manner. Her acting in this shows what good material there is in her. Ruth Stonehouse as Valeska is excellent. Allen Holuber plays his role well.

MUTUAL EXCHANGE MANAGERS IN CHICAGO.

Messrs. H. E. Aitken, C. J. Hite and W. J. Toomey, of the Mutual Film Corporation, left New York, March 26th, to attend a gathering of Mutual exchange managers in Chicago, which was held on the following Thursday. Regarding the recent occupation of the Film Supply Company's offices by Mr. P. A. Powers, Mr. Aitken said before leaving that the subject would be taken up at a meeting of the board of the Film Supply on April 5th, and that, in all probability, Mr. Powers would be asked to vacate. It is reported that other changes in the Film Supply Company are imminent.

UNIVERSAL INDEPENDENT SITUATION UNCHANGED.

The conference in New York City between the independent exchange men who have been using Universal service and the officers of that corporation which was stated to be held on Thursday, March 27th, was postponed until the day following. It was said that while there were many film men in the city, some had been delayed in their arrival by reason of the floods in the Middle West.

An officer of the Universal Film Manufacturing Company said, on Thursday afternoon, that up to that time there had been no contracts entered into. The official said that he believed an amicable working arrangement would be made with the visiting exchange men. Personally, he said, he was unconcerned as to whether contracts were signed or not. Asked if he believed that the result of contract agreements might be an immediate benefit to the Universal, but a restraint or limitation on the company's chances of expansion in the future, the officer quoted said that in his opinion was just about the situation. He added, also, that the Universal Company had explained to the committee of five of the Independent Exchange Company that under no circumstances would the Universal have any dealings, directly or undirectly, with P. A. Powers. It is understood that the Universal last week made a proposition to the exchange men and that the latter made a counter-offer, which the Universal refused to consider.

"A SKIPPER'S STORY," (Great Northern).

The comedy element in the Great Northern company has been called upon to do some very funny stunts in the farce entitled "A Skipper's Story." Three of the stoutest and jolliest comedians in the stock company take the principal roles and they are ably assisted by a score or more of funmakers. The clever story hinges about the boastfulness of Jack, who is an old time skipper and not always as truthful as he might be when his own prowess is brought in question. He claims to have killed sharks, bearded lions in their dens and scared whales into flight when occasion demanded, but in truth he is an ordinary mortal who would prefer to be "a live coward rather than a dead hero." Jack's cronies know his weakness for boasting and they plan a number of clever tricks in order to rid him of the habit. These are very effectively worked out and are sure to prove a source of genuine merriment to the beholder. While swimming with his seafaring pals, Jack is chased by a papier mache shark and is made to appear a coward when he retreats and faints on the landing stage. Later on he is placed face to face with what he supposes is a ferocious tiger, but as a matter of fact it is only a skin which envelops the form of one of his companions. At this juncture, it is said that the fun is fast and furious and Jack makes a wild dash for his ship. After he has recovered from his fright, the three jokers appear on the scene and have the "time of their lives" twitting and joking with the boastful old salt. The comedy is splendidly staged and acted and contains many scenes that carry the flavor of the sea.

Scene from "A Skipper's Story" (Great Northern).

NEW SELIG "JUNGLE" PICTURE.

"A Wise Old Elephant" is the title of a new Selig "jungle" picture to be released April 14. "Toddles" is the name of the celebrated pachyderm, who plays the leading role. In the same cast will appear Miss Kathlyn Williams and Hobart Bosworth. Miss Williams has appeared in most of the Selig animal pictures.

COBB GETS BACK.

After several weeks prowling about in the west C. Lang Cobb, representative of the Ramo Company, returned to New York the other day with roseate stories of business prospects. Mr. Cobb will have full charge of the publicity and sales department of the Ramo Film Co. He expresses confidence in the ability of the new company to make good.

CORRESPONDENCE

ILLINOIS.

THE first of the legislation in Illinois affecting moving picture houses developed in the Senate when Senator Denvir introduced Senate Bill No. 152 providing for the licensing, examining and censoring of motion pictures for public safety and decency. The bill which was referred to the Committee on Judicial Department and Practice is as follows:

> 'That it shall be unlawful for any person to exhibit or operate any motion picture machine, moving picture film or stereopticon view until he has received a license so to do from the State Labor Commissioner. The fee for such license shall be $3.00, to be collected by the said Labor Commissioner before issuing the license. Said license shall be for the term of one (1) year, and may be renewed annually upon the payment of the fee of one (1) dollar.
> Sec. 2. No such license shall be granted until the applicant has passed an examination conducted by said State labor commissioner touching his skill and ability in the working of the mechanical and electrical apparatus and devices used in the operation of motion picture machines, and said State labor commissioner shall have authority to prescribe all necessary rules and regulations concerning such examination.
> Sec. 3. No person shall present, exhibit or display any moving picture films or stereopticon views that are sacrilegious, obscene, indecent or immoral, or would have a tendency to corrupt the morals or shock the sensibilities of those observing the same. It shall be the duty of the State labor commissioner at any and all times to examine and censor, if necessary, any films or views presented by persons as herein provided and said commissioner of labor shall prosecute any person for any violation of this section.
> Sec. 4. Any person who shall exhibit, present or operate any moving picture films or stereopticon views in violation of the provisions of this Act, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof, shall be punished by a fine of not more than two hundred dollars ($200.00).
> Sec. 5. The word 'person' as herein used, shall include any corporation, company, firm or association engaged in the business or occupation as herein prescribed."

The Supreme Court of Illinois has had something to say on the Sunday closing matter which is causing the photoplay managers to sit up and take notice. It holds in the case of the City of Clinton against Joaquin Wilson, proprietor of the Star Theater, that the fine of $10 imposed by a Justice of the Peace will stand as the ordinance is valid. The Dewitt County Circuit Court reverses the judgment of the Circuit Court and remands it with directions. Wilson is said to have operated his shows thirty-six Sundays.

Georgetown is one of the newcomers in the Sunday-issue field, and the matter is likely to get to the balloting stage before the spring election. O. M. Otioe, proprietor of a moving picture house at Pana, was arrested for opening his house on Sunday. The issue went by default in Canton: interested parties delayed, and the legal time for filing the petition to get the Sunday question upon the ballot slipped by. The city council appointed a committee of three to visit the theater proprietors in the hope of getting them to stand the expense of printing special ballots. This brought out some interesting expressions from the managers. William Duffield, manager of the Princess Theater advised the committee to try moving picture reels at the churches on Sunday and see how it worked. He cited an instance the previous winter when he put on "The Life of Moses" at the Baptist church one Sunday night and although the night was stormy and the other churches closed the house was filled. C. J. Shaw, proprietor of Dreamland, said he had children and he'd rather have them go to a moving picture show on Sunday afternoon than to hang around the streets with tough kids. He made a good talk for clean pictures, not only on Sundays but on week days.

Arthus Simons of the Vaudette Amusement Company, of Springfield, who is manager of the No. 1 show of the Kalem "From the Manger to the Cross" had police protection at Danville when he carried the reels down the street. It was announced the films were valued at $10,000 and protection was desired. W. W. Watts and Fred Whitmer are busy with the booking and advertising for this film, having converted the basement of the Vaudette at Springfield into a shipping room for paper and cuts. Rev. Frederick W. Burnham, pastor of First Christian church, which has just been completed and is one of the handsomest edifices in the middle west, spoke from his pulpit for twenty minutes upon the wonders of this picture. While the picture was on at the Vaudette he met one of his parishioners. "Are you coming out to prayer-meeting tonight?" he asked. The answer was vague. "Then you've got to go around to the Vaudette," he admonished, "and see that great picture." Burr H. Swan, that wonderfully alive country editor at Pittsfield, has linked the Kalem masterpiece with another of his public-spirited achievements. His Knights of Pythias opera house picture show has received a new dress. For the opening Easter Sunday he leased "From the Manger to the Cross" outright, and put it on free for the people of his home city. There is quite a demand for the Sunday dates for the picture, a number coming from smaller cities where the population is made of foreign miners. Week-day dates would hardly pay here, but through the kindly offices of local priests the biblical feature is doing a good business. Among the theaters which have been booked by Manager Watts are the Temple, Alton: Lyric, Champaign; Colonial, Joliet; Celestial, Pekin; Quincy, Quincy; Grand Opera House, Kewanee; Bijou, Monmouth; Lyric, Moline; Family, La Salle, and Spring Valley; Star Photoplay, Lincoln; Opera House, Auburn; Opera House, Carlinville; Bijou, Decatur; Colonial, Danville; Rex, Virden; Hunt's Opera House, Jacksonville; Main Street, Bloomington; Crescent, Ottawa; Opera House, Gillespie; Princess, Canton; Empress, Peoria; Belleville, New Baden, Westville, Carlyle and Pawnee.

The physics class of the Grayville high school recently paid a visit to the Electric Theater, where, under the direction of Manager Brechener, they studied the principles of a moving picture machine. It is possible in this way to diffuse throughout a community that machines and films are not the dangerous things they are supposed to be.

Emil and Otto Seng expect to close down their skating rink in the Coliseum at Roberts in a few weeks, and resume the picture shows which will be given about two nights a week.

Rev. Albert R. Fiske of Galesburg before the council of the Federated Church Brotherhoods of that city made two interesting recommendations. One was that steps be taken to bring some influence upon the managers of the moving picture and other theaters that their support might be enlisted in maintaining a clean line of shows and showing only such things as might be educational and afford wholesome amusement. The second was that some steps be taken to secure amusement in the church for the boys and girls. "I would rather be in Mr. Olson's shoes as manager of the Gaiety Theater than minister of the gospel" declared Mr. Fiske, "considering the amount of good I would be able to do by exerting an effort to show clean acts."

S. E. Hurst offered a $5 gold piece for the most appropriate name for his new moving picture theater in the Bremer building at Hillsboro. The same plan was followed at the Rice picture show at St. Joseph, a framed picture being the prize. Ray Harmosen will be operator for the new St. Joseph show and Miss Gladys Sperry, musician.

Louis Gilchrist, the new manager of the Iris at Rockford, announces that his house will play more two, three and four reel features.

The manager of the Princess Theater at Danville is happy over a new Powers 6-A Cameragraph and a new mirror screen.

No advisory vote will be taken on the Sunday theater closing question in Canton. The committee appointed by the churches met with city officials and announced that as the time was too short for a campaign to educate the public the matter would be dropped temporarily. The theater managers had already filed notice with the city officials that any election in which they must share the expense would include a vote upon a proposition to close on Sundays candy, ice cream and cigar stores, livery barns, drug stores, except for filling prescriptions, and all other lines of business.

PHILLIP R. KELLER, president af the executive committee of the National Drainage Congress has sent a cameraman to Buelah, Miss., to take moving pictures of the break in a levee to be exhibited at the meeting of the congress in St. Louis in April. It is believed these pictures will prove an unanswerable argument for the necessity of immediate action by the government to prevent the floods.

Legislators of Missouri were unfavorable to the bill which exercised a censorship upon moving pictures and prevented pictures of murders, Indian fights, legal executions, divorces, scandals, robberies and prize fights. It was reported out unfavorably by the committee to which it had been referred.

PROPRIETORS H. T. Loper of the Lyric and W. W. Watts of the Vaudette have taken a long contemplated step and are trying out the plan of the longer show and the ten-cent admission. These two high-class houses showing licensed pictures report that demands for a lengthier program and the elimination of the constant changing of audiences has been frequent. The Savoy is giving three reels of licensed pictures but not so recent releases for five cents.

The police department has again taken action against the picture show ballo-hoo after receiving reports that competition had led managers to resort to noisemaking in the battle for patronage.

APPROPRIATELY enough, the moving picture situation in Louisville has taken another quick turn and the probability of a settlement of the disagreement between exhibitors and striking musicians and operators seems as remote as ever. It was thought that an early agreement would be reached, but the refusal of both sides to concede certain points has resulted in a deadlock which may never be broken. Lee Masters, of Denver, first vice-president of the International Association of Theatrical Stage Employes, is in Louisville with the idea of renewing negotiations with the Louisville Photo-Play Association. It would cause surprise if this body should give way to the demands of the union men at this stage, however. The musicians have resumed their former tactics of drawing public attention to the situation by parading the streets with a band and signs pointing out the Association houses as "unfair to union labor." So marked have the rough antics of the union men become that one or two exhibitors have announced that they will take the matter to the courts in an effort to secure an injunction. Another meeting between the two bodies is to be held shortly.

For the purpose of establishing a chain of moving picture theaters through the country, the National Moving Picture Company has been incorporated under the laws of Arizona, with headquarters in Louisville. The company has taken quarters in the United States Trust building at Fifth and Main streets. The first house will go up at Shelbyville, Ky., according to the company's plans. The directorate is composed of Granville T. Rider, B. C. Neat, Dr. M. K. Allen and other well-known business men.

The Falls Cities Amusement Company has filed a petition in the Jefferson Circuit Court at Louisville, asking for the appointment of a receiver for the Commercial Bank & Trust Company, which recently closed its doors. The Falls Cities, which controls the Crystal and other motion picture theaters, is a depositor to the extent of $500. The petition alleges that Dr. Ben L. Bruner, former president of the bank, is not qualified to handle its business. The Commercial has announced the payment of a dividend of one-third of its deposits.

The Central Film Service Company, of Indianapolis and Louisville, has announced the installation of the "lock-reel" system, whereby exhibitors will be able to secure their programs two or three weeks in advance instead of the same number of days. The innovation is expected to prove exceedingly popular with exhibitors.

George L. Rapp, a well-known theatrical architect of Chicago, has arrived in Louisville, and will confer with James J. Gaffney, the local architect, in regard to plans for the new Jefferson theater. Mr. Rapp has designed a number of the most imposing theaters in the Windy City, including the Empress and four theaters for the Kohl estate. Work on the Jefferson will begin as soon as the plans are completed, stated Irvin C. Simon, manager of the theater, who is president of the Princess Amusement Company.

A. F. Mayer, manager of the Louisville branch of the Central Film Service Company, had a narrow escape from arrest on a recent visit to Indianapolis. Mr. Mayer committed the crime of walking diagonally across the street in the Indiana metropolis. A burly policeman informed him of his mistake and the film exchange man followed the law by retracing his steps and taking the long way around. The practice is a new one in Indianapolis, and has been the cause of many complaints. Its legality is to be tested, it is reported.

"Leah, the Forsaken," a three-reel Imp played a return engagement at the Novelty theater recently. The first apearance of the film attracted much attention, and Manager Dave Levinson re-played it by request. Mr. Levinson announces for the near future a portrayal of "Sapho." The Atlas Manufacturing Company, of St. Louis, is responsible for this production. Mr. Levinson has arranged a private performance for his own benefit before showing the picture to the public.

The Universal service has found several new adherents recently. The Clifton theater, Louisville, and the Palace, in the same city, are now using Universal service, as is the Marcum theater, Charlestown, Ind., conducted by Logan Combs.

The use of moving pictures for commercial purposes again came to light during the annual convention of the Kentucky Retail Hardware Dealers' Association in Louisville recently. Following the business sessions at the Galt House, the Globe Stove & Range Company, of Kokomo, Ind., gave a motion picture performance, showing the hardware dealers just how their product is manufactured. The company did a brisk business at the convention, as a direct result of the films.

Work on the new National theater, Fifth and Walnuts strets, Louisville, has been resumed, the difficulty between the union and the contractors having been adjusted. Only a short time was lost, though workmen on other buildings being constructed quit temporarily in sympathy.

J. A. Lindell, owner of the Bijou theater, of Paducah, Ky., came out second best in a contest with the Police Court of that city as his opponent. Lindell was arrested charged with failure to pay his annual license of $100. The exhibitor was found guilty and fined $25 for operating a theater without a license. In addition, he was required to pay 10 per cent above the cost of the license, the total expenditure agregating $135.

The Northside Amusement Company has filed articles of incorporation in Cincinnati, O., with a capitalization of $40,000. A motion picture house is to be conducted. The incorporators are Harry G. Kruse, John J. Vogelpohl, John H. Browe, C. J. Keller and William A. Schmid.

Manager J. B. Elliott, of the Colonial theater, of Lexington, Ky., has installed a new mirror screen in his house. The screen came from Fordsville, Pa., weighing 1,500 pounds.

The annual meeting of the Kentucky Motion Picture Exhibitors' League will be held in Louisville April 23 and 24, acording to an announcement by Louis J. Dittmar, one of the officers of the organization. The exact place of meeting has not yet been determined. The Seelbach Hotel will probably be the scene of the gathering, however. The Kentucky organization is growing rapidly in size and strength and officers are elated over the fine showing made. The meeting will be important, many topics of vital interest being scheduled. Among the most important is that of means and ways of combating or quelling the agitation against Sunday performances. This has been marked in Lexington and other Central Kentucky cities recently. Sundays are big days with the exhibitors, and they would suffer a severe blow were they forced to suspend on that day.

Louis Stenrle, of the Broadway Amusement Company, has returned from a long trip through the South. Mr. Steurle is in splendid health, spending a part of his time at Hot Springs. The exhibitor inspected various theaters in the South, and secured many new ideas which will be incorporated in the East Broadway theater, which will be remodeled during the next few months. The Broadway Amusement Company has secured the American Players for a short engagement, and if the troupe of five people proves satisfactory, it will be retained for a longer period. Animated pictures, as in the past, will remain the chief attractions at the Broadway houses, however.

A growing tendency of exhibitors, or at least a part of them, to abuse films when they are through with them, has been demonstrated recently in Louisville, causing much adverse comment. This subject is one which has been discussed thoroughly at various conventions and other meetings, but which will bear further comment. The most recent instance of the need of care in handling subjects was at the Novelty theater, Louisville, where Sapho was to be shown. David Levinson, manager of the house, gave the film a screen showing in advance, and found that the film was not physically fit to be shown. It had evidently had rough usage, though comparatively new. The picture had been liberally advertised and packed houses turned out for the subject. Mr. Levinson had the choice of showing the mutilated, unsatisfactory film, or disappointing his audience. He chose the latter course, and thereby caused much disappointment on the part of people who had paid to see Sapho. The film is a product of the Atlas Film Manufacturing Company, of St. Louis. That company, probably, was not responsible for the condition of the picture. Exhibitors are prone to forget that others are waiting for the pictures. Several cases of this have come up recently, and exchange men are finding much difficulty in persuading managers of houses that the film is not to be relegated to the discard after they have finished with it.

The Clifton theater, of Louisville, has given away souvenirs in the form of boxes of candy recently. About twenty boxes of sweets were distributed each day, owners of lucky tickets being the winners. The plan has been instrumental in increasing patronage and making the Clifton one of the most popular of the East-end theaters.

Work on the Standard theater, of Cincinnati, has been stopped, union men objecting to the employment of non-union labor in setting reinforcing rods for the concrete. The question is an unusual one, in which exhibitors are taking deep interest. It is asserted that the setting of reinforcing rods does not call for any particular skill, a common laborer being able to do the work as well as a skilled workman. The difference in pay is about 40 cents an hour, however. Should it be decided that it does require skilled, or, in this case, union labor to set the rods, the owners of the Standard will be forced to pay the difference in price. The contract betwen the owners and the builders called for the payment of the minimum.

The Northside Amusement Company has been formed at Cincinnati to take over the Park Amusement Company. A new theater will be erected by the company in the near future, going up at Hamilton avenue, near Pullan. The house will contain 600 seats and two stores. A billiard hall will be above the foyer. It will be 45 by 155 feet.

The Norwood Theater Company, of Cincinnati, has awarded the contract for its 1,000-seat theater to the Ohio Building and Construction Company, and work will begin at once. The motion picture house will be on the east side of Montgomery road, in Norwood.

Paul J. Rainey's moving pictures of African beasts in their lair are the latest in Lexington, Ky., where they are being shown. The pictures are said to be unusual in many respects and have attracted widespread interest. Dr. H. H. Roberts, medical director of the Knights of Pythias home at Lexington, took a block of eighty seats for the performance, other orphan's institutions also taking the kiddies to the show.

The Colonial theater, of Lexington, Ky., has resumed business after being closed down for several weeks for repairs. The house is larger and handsomer than ever and will take care of a heavy volume of business. The theater has been redecorated, a number of seats added, and a new mirror screen installed. John Elliott is manager of the Colonial, which is one of the leading houses of Lexington.

A new machine has been installed by the Auditorium at Danville, Ky. The management of the theater are advertising the addition widely, calling attention to its fireproof qualities.

W. E. Scales has opened a new motion picture house at Lebanon, Tenn. Vaudeville is to be used in conjunction with the animated pictures.

AT a meeting of the Feature Film Exchange men held recently at 1202 Race street, twelve exchanges were represented and the Feature Film Credit Association of Philadelphia was organized. An election of temporary officers resulted in the election of W. R. Mack, president; H. B. Reynolds, secretary; E. O. Prince, treasurer. Another meeting will be called in the near future when plans for a general credit system will be worked out. At the present time the feature and other exchanges are having a large amount of trouble making collections, and the feature men decided that the only way to protect themselves was to form a credit association, where every exhibitor will be rated so that the exchange men will know with whom to deal and with whom not to deal.

The theater which was formerly owned by F. F. Trainer, located at Fifty-second street and Girard avenue, has been purchased by the Commonwealth Title Insurance and Trust Company of this city for nominal consideration subject to a mortgage of $18,000 of the first class and a second mortgage of $8000.

Announcement was made a few days ago by a local real estate firm that Thomas W. Dougherty of the Nixon-Nirdlinger staff had leased for a period of ten years, the moving picture theater which will be erected on the site of the late Meta Connor Wood mansion, at the southwest corner of Broad and Thompson streets. The house has been named the "Strand." The leasee promises a style of theater and entertainment in vogue at the Carnegie Lyceum, in New York, and at the Alhambra in Cleveland, but which is said to be new in this city. The theater will be of Spanish design and the outside walls will be of white terra-cotta. According to the management the theater will be opened to the public on June 1st. Besides having the most modern motion picture equipment, the theater will be equipped with a Wurlitzer-Hope-Jones orchestra and pipe organ.

The A. B. C. Theater, Thirty-second and Chestnut streets, had its opening recently under the management of M. A. Benn. George Kline, of the Fairmount Feature Film Company, is making rapid strides in the moving picture exchange business, and is booking some great features in the houses of Philadelphia and vicinity. One of the latest is the "Beasts of the Jungle," which is causing much comment among the exhibitors, owing to the high class of the photography.

Motion picture exhibitors are on the run after the new feature "Pilgrims Progress" which is one of the finest examples of photography which has been seen in Philadelphia for some time. This picture is making a big hit in the Catholic sections of Philadelphia, and a great many exhibitors have to re-book the feature by request from their patrons.

John G. Sacks is remodeling his theater in Allentown and expects to re-open it to the public by the middle of the month. Mr. Sacks was in partnership with Mr. Roxberry, and then sold his share in the establishment to Mr. William Manley. Mr. Sacks is an experienced motion picture man and was one of the first to open a theater in Allentown.

Workmen are busy remodeling the building at 4545 to 4549 Lancaster avenue into a modern picture house, which will be a credit to that section of the city when completed. The cost of the new house will be about $12,000.

The National Motion Picture Company of Philadelphia has just been incorporated under the laws of Pennsylvania with a capitalization of $200,000.

George W. Bradenburgh is receiving large importations of films from Europe, and during the past week he has paid out to customs officials as duty on the films over $1,000.

Zorn & Supplee, of the Broadway Theater, have now under way a new motion picture theater which will meet all requirements of the modern photoplay critic. The furnishing and interior decorations will be of high character throughout and the capacity will be over one thousand seats.

The "Auto Bandits", a feature which has had a most popular run in the local theaters, still continues to draw large crowds for the exhibitors, and the Quaker City Feature Exchange has not missed a single day's booking for this great picture.

The Fairmount Feature Film Exchange which recently opened in Philadelphia is enjoying a big business. Those in charge of the exchange are trying to give the exhibitors the very best features possible and are sparing no expense in getting the goods.

Another feature house to open in Philadelphia is the American-European Feature Echange. This concern handles a large amount of imported features of the very highest standing and is claiming a large portion of the local trade.

I. Singer and Mr. Siegel of the Liberty Feature Exchange are having a very busy time, taking care of their many customers. Since opening in Philadelphia these two men have taken a prominent part in the motion picture business, and they are placing shows with some of the largest houses in the city.

George Graff, who was formerly connected with the Quaker City Feature Exchange and later with the Star Feature Film Company, is making arrangements to open a new exchange. Mr. Graff was the first man to rent feature films in Philadelphia and has a large acquaintance with the local exhibitors who will be pleased to see him back in the feature game.

William Kamp, may be seen daily in his private office at the Calehuff Supply Company where he will meet all prospective buyers of Edison, Power's and Motiograph machines, and point out the different qualities. Kamp recently returned from a trip to Atlantic City, where he was drumming up business for the concern he represents.

Edward Kruapa has been appointed Assistant Director of Public Safety at Atlantic City and he is making frequent trips to the resort city inspecting the moving picture theaters.

NEW ENGLAND NOTES.

LARUE VIEDENBURGH, of the Edison Illuminating Company, of Boston, delivered an address before the members of the Boston Scientific Society, in the Chauncy Hall Building, Boston, last week, in which he lauded the educational value of motion pictures. Mr. Vredenburgh remarked that "the greatest thing of all in the mind of that wizard, Thomas A. Edison, the greatest man, dead or alive, in the history of electrical science, is the idea of the use of motion pictures for educational purposes."

Dr. Frederick V. Fisher, manager of the lecture bureau of the Panama-Pacific International Exposition, delivered a lecture at an assembly luncheon of the Boston Chamber of Commerce, at the American House, February 25. Motion pictures of the Panama Canal, showing the actual construction work, were shown and created a marked impression upon those present. The exposition and California scenes were also thrown on the screen.

The bill before the Massachusetts Legislature relative to the censoring of all pictures used in that state, was given "leave to withdraw," which will greatly please Massachusetts exhibitors. These same exhibitors should be duly grateful to the Massachusetts Exhibitors' League, as it was due to the energy of this body that the committee in charge of the bill was shown the injustice and utter uselessness of it. President Joseph Mack, of the League, made a strikingly able speech, that won the day for the exhibitors.

It is with great pleasure that we are able to report that the petition of Mr. Mack, in behalf of the League, that exhibitions of moving pictures may be run continuously for one hour instead of for twenty minutes, as at present, before five minutes of some other form of amusement is interspersed was reported favorably to the Senate, and had its first reading on Friday, Febuary 28.

Frank Booth is now in charge of Boyden's Theater, Taunton, Mass., having taken over the managership of this new theater. For the last few years Mr. Booth had been associated with the Park Theater of Taunton. Every report indicates that Boyden's Theater has jumped into popularity, as, indeed it should. The house is a first class one in every way, and offers a good program of vaudeville and pictures. Manager Booth states it is his firm intention to "deliver the goods" to his patrons all of the time.

Manager M. W. O'Brien of the Scenic Temple, Boston, is doing a splendid business these days, notwithstanding keen competition. Of course, the reason for this pleasing state of affairs can be found in the fact that Manager O'Brien knows what his trade wants, and does not hesitate to supply the demand. The Scenic has always held a most enviable name for itself, being called "a model of its kind" by several of the local clergy.

Several Massachusetts exhibitors are leaving that territory, to try their fortune in New York State. W. C. Youngson, formerly manager of the Bijou Theater, North Adams, Mass., has formed a partnership with Lewis J. Cody, and William C. O'Brieu who sometime ago was in charge of the Bijou. The Darling Theater of Gloversville, N. Y., has been leased by the new concern. Mr. O'Brien has lately been in charge of the Emily Theater, of Gloversville, but has now resigned in order to guide the Darling Theater.

Gus. Schlesinger, who managed the St. James Theater, Boston, while M. H. Gulesian, was giving stock company attractions, has left that theater, since Marcus Loew took possession with his programs of vaudeville and pictures. Manager Schlesinger is now at the head of the Lee Avenue Academy Theater, Brooklyn, N. Y., which is owned by his brother, Morris Schlesinger.

Messrs. "Moe" and "Mitch" Mark announce that everything possible will be done to push along the new theater they are to build at Lynn, Mass. The new house will have a seating capacity of around 2600 and is to be the best that money can buy. Active work will probably not be started until Spring, owing to certain obstacles in the way. Al. Newhall, now in charge of Moe Mark's Comique Theater, Lynn, will be a very busy man before the year is out, as he will have charge of the new house, as well as the old one. Manager Newhall will be able to swing both houses, as he has unquestioned ability, plus a great amount of energy and push.

Howe's moving pictures had another extremely profitable engagement at Manager D. O. Gilmore's Court Square Theater Springfield, Mass., from February 27 to March 1. The Court Square is a 'legitimate" house as a general thing, but offers Howe's pictures now and then to packed houses.

Manager Knight of the Bijou Theater, Springfield, Mass., had some very nice free publicity when the Colonial Minstrel Four appeared at a free concert at the city's new auditorium, February 19. The Bijou is a vaudeville and picture house, and has the reputation of being a splendid money making proposition, due to the well directed efforts of Manager Knight, who is considered an unusually capable executive.

The Princess Theater, Hartford, Conn., recently contracted with Frank Manning, Eastern representative of the Mirror Screen Company of Shelbyville, Ind., for one of the company's mirror screens. The Princess is very well pleased with its bargain, and is proving a good booster for the Mirror Screen Company.

The Great Eastern Film Manufacturing Co. has acquired a four story building in Stoughton, Mass., where it will locate a manufacturing plant and studio. The Great Eastern has offices at 218 Tremont Street, Boston, and is a $200,000 corporation, with James A. Reid as treasurer. Mr. Reid is at present at Jacksonville, Fla., locating suitable winter quarters for his company of photoplayers. Miss Virginia Keatingue, formerly of the Cottage Theater, Chicago, has been secured as leading lady.

Randall F. Smith, who has tried for some time to secure a license to operate a photoplay theater in the Forest Park district of Springfield, Mass., was finally turned down. Residents of the Forest Park district were dead against the issuance of the license, and brought considerable pressure to bear on the matter.

The Colonial Theater, Lawrence, Mass., plays to "legitimate' road attractions during the week, but Julius Cahn finds that vaudeville and picture programs are needed to secure the big Saturday and Sunday business.

F. A. Moxon, manager of the Nickel theater, Lawrence, Mass., finds business most satisfactory, with programs of pictures and illustrated songs. No vaudeville is used nor does it seem to be required by the Nickel. Manager F. L. Boyd, of the Columbia theater, runs on a similar policy, and business seems to be good.

Manager J. M. Mosher, manager of Keith's Hippodrome theater, Portland, Me., announces that he will exhibit the Edison Talking Pictures in the very near future.

Joseph A. McConville is now in charge of the New Portland theater, Portland, Me., and is offering the regulation bills of vaudeville and pictures.

Manager H. C. Parsons of Parsons' theater, Hartford, Conn., a "legitimate" theater, offered Paul J. Rainey's African Hunt pictures on February 24-26, and was exceedingly pleased with the patronage these reels drew.

It is rumored that the Scenic Temple, Boston, one of the William Bradstreet circuit of theaters, devoted to vaudeville and pictures, will be torn down this summer to allow a more modern theater to be built. The Scenic was formerly a church, and was slightly altered some time ago.

The week of February 24 saw a world of activity in the moving picture business of Boston, with Edison's Talking Pictures at Keith's and the National Theaters, and "The Miracle" playing at the Colonial theater, with an augmented orchestra and a chorus of 100 voices at prices up to $1.50. The press had many good things to say about "The Miracle." Here is a sample of what the papers gave out: "Unusual, almost unbelievable, the wordless mystery play held a large audience spellbound, astonished, and enthusiastically surprised at its first production at the Colonial last night." Great interest was shown at the exhibitions of the new talking pictures. When the writer saw them at Keith's they were very well received. The picture of Mr. Edison thrown on the screen started a demonstration so prolonged and enthusiastic that one might have thought one was witnessing a presidential nomination. The Talking Pictures are to be exhibited at Keith's and the National indefinitely.

Herman Rifkin, manager of the Eastern Feature Film Company, announces that he has opened a New York office at 12 Union Square, in addition to his Boston headquarters at 224 Tremont Street. An exclusive line of features are pulling in the business for this wide-awake concern.

S. B. Leland is busy these days booking the multiple reel feature film "From the Manger to the Cross" in New Hampshire, Vermont and Maine. The Majestic theater of Burlington, Vt., was filled to its capacity of 700 at every performance, while this feature was being exhibited.

Theater ticket speculators are now working the large vaudeville and picture houses. The National theater, Boston, is being annoyed in this way, and refuses to honor tickets bought of speculators whenever possible.

The reels were particularly good, and Mr. Hamilton delivered a most interesting and instructive lecture, declaring that the atrocities attributed to the Turkish Army are false, and that the Ottoman government was wholly unprepared for the strife, while the allies particularly the Bulgarians, Servians and Montenegrins, had been preparing for years.

A co-operative scheme of public education, relative to health and sanitation, is being seriously considered by all the principal cities of Western Canada. Moving pictures are to turn the trick; the idea being that each city shall purchase one picture, of an educational nature. These reels will be interchanged between the various cities, and will be lectured upon by a physician. It is hoped that photoplay theaters will be willing to lend their auditoriums for this purpose. In this way a municipal hygiene campaign will be waged, and the public informed as to health and sanitation, in an entertaining way. The idea is a good one and should be pushed through.

Mr. Kolb and his brother, Emery, described graphically the running of over 300 rapids in 1,400 miles, through six states, and descending 6,000 feet in open boats.

"The Miracle" ended a two-weeks' stay in Boston on March 8. As far as the writer could judge, these motion pictures drew to fair business, which should be considered a creditable performance, as the prices ranged downwards from $1.50. Rev. E. A. Horton, chaplain of the Senate, is one of the well-known clergymen who saw the pictures of "The Miracle" at the Colonial Theater, and he was so greatly interested that he wrote this letter to the manager of the presentation: "For the past year I have seen many displays of this kind on the Continent and in England. They always seem wonderful to me in mechanism and dramatic effect. 'The Miracle' held my constant attention and gave me great reward in suggestion and pleasure." Such a statement, coming from so well-known a man as Rev. Horton, should prove of good use to the publicity department of "The Miracle."

The Judiciary Committee of the General Assembly, at New Haven, Conn., will spend a good portion of its time this week on moving pictures, as several measures relative to the electric theater are scheduled for hearings, which have been introduced by senators and representatives. On Tuesday, the Judiciary Committee will look into the bill introduced by Senator Frolich of New Haven, to permit moving picture theaters to be open Sunday afternoon and evening. A committee of moving picture men will be present at this hearing, armed with many facts going to show that it is distinctly beneficial to the public to allow the bill to pass. There surely is no reason why it should not be made a law, as it is far better to have folks in a well-conducted photoplay theater on a Sunday than to have them walking the streets.

David W. Noyes is now suing W. H. Meharry to recover $4,000 paid for a Boston picture house. The Supreme Court holds that it is not the spirit of the law to extend for the benefit of sellers, the limits of immunity for false statements under the guise of trade talk. Mr. Noyes claims that Mr. Meharry told him that the theater in question was making a profit of $1,000 a month. Mr. Noyes went to the theater daily for a month or so, and always found well-filled auditoriums. Business certainly did look brisk, so Mr. Noyes bought the theater. And then business dropped in most discouraging fashion. The theater did not run at a profit except on Saturdays. Mr. Noyes entered suit, claiming that a fictitious attendance had been arranged for, and has now secured judgment, recovering $4,323.

Lynch, son of the proprietor, and spread with such swiftness that the loss is estimated at $35,000.

There is some talk that the Mutual Film Corporation's Boston Office will secure the upper portion of the new building on Boylston street, erected for the Walker-Gordon Company, and use it for its exhibition room. Plans were practically completed when unforseen obstacles came up to block the idea. It is hoped that this building will be judged suitable for running off advance releases by the authorities, in which case the Boylston street building will be leased by the Mutual folks. It is located in the residential district, just above Massachusetts avenue.

When the Massachusetts branch of the M. P. E. L. of A. opens its headquarters, it is hoped that the several film exchanges of Boston will be willing to use the place to run off their advance releases for the managers. If this plan is put through, it will help a great deal, as the rental secured from the various exchanges would go towards defraying the League's expenses. All of which goes to show that President Mack is a level-headed business man, as well as a right good fellow.

It is a two-story brick building on a lot 48 x 94 feet and is assessed at $20,000.

Look Out for "The Impostor"

PARIS, March 25th — (Special Despatch to The Moving Picture World.)

Conspiracy and the more serious charge of trafficking in human beings is the accusation against Isadore Breschard and his wife, who are held here without bail. The star witness against the prisoners is Mrs. Raymond Durieux. She furnishes proof to support her charge that the Breschards tricked her into believing that her mother-in-law, the wealthy Mrs. Pierre Durieux, would not receive her and her child, after having been invited to come from America to enjoy her hospitality. Madame Durieux, Jr., swears that the Breschard woman stole her papers of identification, sold her child to a flower vender and impersonated her in the home of Madame Durieux, Sr., whose fortune she attempted to steal.

The arrest was made at Havre by government agents, who had been gathering evidence against the Breschards for exporting young women to South America for motives sinister.

Madame Durieux, Jr., met the Breschards on board ship, coming from America. She confided to them the story of the death of her husband, a wayward son, and of her coming to France to accept the home offered herself and child.

It appears that the Breschards sent wireless messages to France on nearing the coast. On the arrival of the steamship, a telegram was handed to Madame Durieux, supposed to have been signed by her mother-in-law. It read that circumstances made it impossible for the elder woman to receive her.

The Breschards, wolves in sheep's clothing, promised to find work for her. After arriving at a small hotel in Havre, Madame Durieux found that her papers of identification had been stolen. She was later told that a position as governess in a South American family had been obtained, but that she would be unable to take her child with her. The little girl was shipped to a flower vender in Paris, where with other unfortunates she was forced to work on the streets.

The schemers were foiled individually at the same time. The Breschard woman had gone to the elder Mrs. Durieux' home and falsely established her identity with the aid of the stolen papers. She said the child had died previous to their leaving for France. The conspirator contrived to wheedle the elder Mrs. Durieux into giving her control of her property.

Little Jennie Durieux, rebelling because of cruel treatment given her, decided to ask aid from her grandmother, whose address had been given her by her mother. Jennie asked a passerby to direct her. The stranger was Peter R. Gillen, local magistrate. He became interested in the tot and took her to her grandmother's home. The latter quickly understood that something was amiss. She recognized the little one by the resemblance to her father.

The Breschard woman came into the room and little Jennie denounced her as being a usurper and a "bad, bad woman," as the little one expressed it. The impostor was arrested and taken to police headquarters. Coincidentally there arrived at the same time Isidore Breschard and his women victims.

The case is very strong against the Breschards, and it is unlikely that the severity of the law dealing with such cases will be mitigated.

LICENSED FILM STORIES

VITAGRAPH.

BUNNY'S HONEYMOON (April. 7).—Bunny's niece has a beau who is so addicted to drink that her father will not permit her to marry him. He has given the lad a chance, but when he comes upon him drunk again, he orders his daughter to break it all off. She goes to Uncle Bunny, who thinks up a scheme to cure the drunkard. In persuance of this, he brings the lad, so drunk that he can't see straight, to his home and by dressing up in woman gear, and by borrowed kids, makes him think he has married a fat widow with many children. The poor lad is so greatly worried that, when he wakes up next morning, he really swears off. So, in the end, the lovers are happy.

THE TRANSITION (April 8).—Pete conducts an illicit still. Sheriff McCall is on his track. Magnus sees the officer approaching and wounds McCall. Nora, the moonshiner's daughter, hears the shot and comes upon the prostrate body and assists him to her home. She sees his badge and extracts the warrant for her father's arrest from his pocket. Her father returns and is enraged at the sight of the sheriff. Nora interferes, but he cannot control his rage, throws his daughter aside and would have killed the sheriff had not the deputies appeared upon the scene, subdued Magnus and placed the handcuffs upon him. Five years later he returns, wealthy, and tells the widow of his love and she confesses hers.

When the chorus appears, his eyes light upon Dolly and Kitty, with whom he tries to flirt. Flora Scrawny mistakes Cutey's efforts as being directed to her. He hastens around to the stage door with a bouquet of flowers, tries to present them to Kitty, and when she will not accept them, he offers them to Dolly. Flora appears and takes it for granted that he is waiting for her. Cutey tries to make her understand that she is not in it.

He sends a diamond ring with a bouquet of flowers to Dolly. Flora is disappointed that he had not sent them to her. Dolly consoles Flora by telling her she does not care for Cutey, and she will reply to the letter, saying that she and Kitty will be there to dinner, but Flora can go and meet him herself. Cutey goes to the restaurant and waits patiently for their coming. Billy and Johnny hire a sandwich man of gigantic size to impersonate Flora's brother. While Cutey is waiting for the party, Flora slips into the restaurant and takes a seat at his table. He becomes impatient and determines to have something to eat himself. When he reaches his table he finds Flora sitting there. He is completely upset and loses his appetite at once. Flora, Kitty, Johnny, Billy and the sandwich man reach the restaurant just as Cutey is about to take a quiet little steak. The sandwich man takes a seat at the table and threatens to chastise Cutey if he does not make himself agreeable and make good his attentions to his injured "sister." Flora and Kitty, Johnny and Billy, who have been dining at another table, come over and congratulate Cutey upon his engagement to Miss Flora, and under the scowling and threatening eyes of the big "brother," Cutey is obliged to escort Flora to her home.

Anna is too much for her step-mother to handle and has a fixed purpose in her mind to have a whole lot of fun with her boob step-brother, but she has not reckoned with her host. The boy is more than a match for her. He exercises a strong hand over Anna and proves a great influence for good in her behalf. She grows to be a very congenial companion for her step-mother and a great comfort to her father.

LAYING A MARINE CABLE (April 11).—The recent laying of the telegraphic cable under the sea calls to mind the wonderful achievements of telegraphy and the first laying of the Morse Atlantic Cable from America to Europe, connecting the Western with the Eastern hemisphere. The unwinding and laying of 3,000 miles of cable under and across the Atlantic Ocean, is a gigantic and marvelous achievement, almost incomprehensible, but all made quite clear in this remarkable educational film.

MYSTERY OF THE STOLEN CHILD (April 12).—An enemy of Mr. Frost, desiring revenge, reads of the death of Mr. and Mrs. Marvell, his daughter and son-in-law. Mr. Frost adopts the little girl and requires a nurse. His enemy sends a woman accomplice who secures the position. Instead of being taken to the steamer his family is being taken as prisoners to a lonely house. Frost arrives and rescues them and the chauffeur flees. On board the ship the family meet Lambert Chase, a detective. One day on the boat the little girl disappears. Her folks consult the detective and he laughingly takes them to where he has wrapped her up warmly in a large steamer rug.

LUBIN.

THE EVIL ONE (April 7).—"Little Wild Cat" was a spirited Indian maiden of the Coahuila tribe, and many braves were in love with her, but she accepted only Fleet Foot, the adopted son of the chief. One day two braves proposed marriage to her and she refused them. It happened that a few hours later they were taken ill and they blamed it to an evil spirit within "Little Wild Cat." The same day, when passing the hut of an old Indian, she saw a bowl of milk, and being thirsty, she lifted it and took a drink, but found that the milk was sour. The old man came from the house in time to see her; he, too, tasted the milk and, finding it sour, vowed she was a witch. In despair she appealed to the chief, and as he was about to pronounce her "Good Squaw," a pail hanging from the roof of his hut fell with a crash. His heart was filled with superstitious fear and he ordered her to leave the village on penalty of death. Fleet Foot decided to join in her flight and sent her forth in the great desert, promising to meet her with food and water. In the darkness she lost her way and they both wandered across the sandy stretch, each in search of the other. The tribe determined to kill the evil one and gave chase. When Fleet Foot discovered "Little Wild Cat," she was almost overcome. Three of the pursuers overtook them and in a fierce encounter Fleet Foot killed two braves; the other took flight. They struggled on and at last reached the Indian agency, where kindly hands administered to them. When "Little Wild Cat" was sufficiently recovered, she and Fleet Foot were married by the minister.

FOR HIS CHILD'S SAKE (April 8).—Jacques LeBarge lives with his wife and three-year-old daughter in a cabin. Their existence is happy, but Mary longs at times for the life of civilization. Wayne Milan, a former love, persuades her to leave her husband. Milan, however, refuses to take the child. Jacques returns to the cabin to find a note from Mary telling of her desertion. The child has seen the father approaching the cabin and playfully hides in the clothes closet. The father thinks Mary has taken the child with her. Jacques starts in pursuit. In the terrible anger over the discovery, he accidentally knocks over a chair in front of the fireplace of the cabin. A large coat is on the back of the chair, and soon after Jacques leaves the cabin this begins to burn, setting fire to the rest of the room. Jacques plunges into the forest on his mision of murder. He finds his wife before he goes far. She is caught in one of his own steel traps, and has been deserted by the coward Milan. She tells him the little girl has been left in the cabin. He looks, the cabin is in flames. Wife or child—which? He dashes away from the mother, back to the cabin and rescues the child as she lies on the closet floor, almost suffocated. Woodchoppers nearby rush to the cabin and receive Jacques and the child. Weakly, hysterically, Jacques runs to the spot where his wife is entrapped. With the aid of the men he releases her from the powerful steel jaws of the trap. The love she has displayed for the child has swept away Jacques' anger for her. As the semi-conscious mother lies on the ground, calling feebly for her little one, Jacques forgives her.

ANGEL CAKE AND AXLE GREASE (April 10).—Col. Hopkins, Betty, his daughter, Bob and Pete, play a game of quoits. The colonel and Bob have a quarrel and Pete, who is Bob's rival for Betty's love, urges the colonel on till Bob is discharged and Pete himself is made foreman. Bob gets work in the store; and writes to Betty of the fact, and sends the letter by Buck. When Buck gets to the ranch, Betty has just finished baking some angel cakes. She packs a large cake in a box and writes a note to Bob, telling him that if he does not eat it all, she will not love him any more. She gives Buck a piece of cake to carry the box to Bob. While Buck is sitting by a tree eating his cake, Pete gets the box and butters the cake with a generous layer of axle grease. When Buck is nearing the store, he is stopped by five or six Indians and they take the cake away from him and have a feast. Buck, seeing it disappear so fast, grasps a piece and eats it himself. Bob and the storekeeper are soon busy doping a lot of sick Indians with pain killer. Betty, on her road to the store for supplies, comes upon the crowd, and Bob points to the terrible work of her cake. Betty cannot believe that her nice-looking cake was capable of laying out a half-dozen Redskins. She begins an investigation and scents axle grease. Suspicion points to Pete, and a plot is hatched to make him confess. Betty sends a note to the Colonel, "I am in trouble, come quick and bring Pete." When they arrive the sheriff pretends to arrest Betty for poisoning the Indians. Pete confesses and the colonel fires him and Bob is restored to favor.

THE SPLIT NUGGET (April 11).—John Stanton, a miner, his wife and children, a son and a daughter, live in a cabin about a mile from Stanton's claim. One day the boy discovers several stones which he carries back to show to the father. They prove to be nuggets, one more valuable than the rest. The father takes the nugget and cuts it in half, giving one part to the boy and the other to the girl. The father starts out to work one morning and takes the boy with him. While at work the cabin is attacked by Indians, who kill the mother and set fire to the house. The father hears the fight and starts for the cabin. He arrives and gives the Indians battle. He is mortally wounded and the Indians depart, taking the girl with them. In the meantime the boy gets worried at his father's continued absence and starts for home. He arrives just before the father dies and the father tells him to be on the watch for his sister and find her if possible. Later the boy is found by a party of prospectors and cured for. Fifteen years elapse and the boy has grown to manhood. The prospectors who adopted him have struck it rich, and owners of a valuable mine. The boy holds the position of cashier. In the meantime the girl has been brought up by the Indians. One day she meets a young man who is immediately smitten by her beauty. They are married. Unknown to the girl, her husband is a bandit. Poverty overtakes them and the young husband resolves to look for work. He sees a pack train carrying gold dust from the mine to the bank and decides to rob it. He carries out his plan and in the holdup Harold is wounded. The bandit gets the gold and escapes. The wounded boy chances upon the cabin and his wounds are dressed by the girl. The bandit returns home and is overpowered by Harold. One of the miners, who went for aid, has formed a posse and is returning to the scene of the holdup. They follow the tracks to the cabin. In the meantime the boy, having learned that the bandit's wife is his sister, decides to save her husband. He sends the posse on a false trail and saves them both.

PETE TRIES THE STAGE (April 12).—Pete Meadows longs to become an actor. LeGrade, proprietor of a hotel where Pete stops, gives Pete one more day in which to pay much past due rent. Pete escapes, with his baggage through the window, the shock causing the violent LeGrade to go into wild hysteria. Pete goes to new lodgings and, finally, through Rosa Redmond, a booking agent, secures a contract in vaudeville. Incidentally, he gains her personal admiration to an amazing degree. She sees that his embonpoint is admirably fitted for the portrayal of the part of Falstaff, and books him to play a sketch of "The Merry Wives of Windsor." A packed house, including Rosa, is on hand. Pete is awkward and nervous in delivering his first love scene with Mistress Ford and the audience is correspondingly amused, much to the disgust of Rosa. During the action of the sketch, Pete, as Falstaff, is disguised as a witch and hidden behind a screen on sudden news of the approach of Mr. Ford. Just as Pete has donned his woman's clothes, there is ushered into a front box, LeGrade! The excitable Frenchman immediately recognizes the hated Pete, and creates a sensation. Pete forgets his lines. Fighting his way through a delighted crowd on the sidewalk he leaps into a taxi and is driven ten miles into the country. Then he makes the discovery that he hasn't a cent of money. Dismayed, he makes his escape. He walks the railway ties back to his boarding house. Here he finds his landlady awaiting him with a letter from Rosa to the effect that although he is a failure as a thespian, he can have a job in her office opening the mail.

The young deputy determines to go out after the gang. He leaves a note for his brother and starts. He runs across a note fastened to a tree, which reads, "Go back or you die with the sun." Frightened, Dick hides. His brother, Bill, coming home after a hard ride, finds the note of his brother and determines to follow him. ESSANAY.

THE WARDROBE LADY (April 8).—If it hadn't been for Harriet Wayne suspecting that she would lose her sister, Priscilla, this story would not be told. The fact of the matter was, however, that Priscilla's sweetheart, afraid to propose to her, face to face, wrote her a note and asked her to marry him. Priscilla's old maid sister, Harriet, received the letter which she failed to deliver. Years pass by and we see the old lover, Joe Stoddard, a prosperous business man. Fate, however, brings the two together. An explanation is brought about and a reconciliation. The curtain falls on the two lovers awaiting the arrival of the minister.

THE SHERIFF'S WIFE (April 9).—Kindness saved the sheriff and his wife, also a sack of gold which has been left in their care. Sewani, an Indian girl, tries to sell her wares, but is unsuccessful until she meets the sheriff, who purchases a pipe from her. This, he presents to his wife as a keepsake. That afternoon, Black Jake, a notorious outlaw is captured and lodged in jail. A bag of gold is taken from him, which the sheriff gives to his wife to keep until the following day. That night, two worthless fellows try to steal the money. They first capture the sheriff, take him to a shed where they bind him. Sewani not forgetting the sheriff's kindness, hearing his cries for help, frees him. The bandits are outwitted by the sheriff's wife, who hides in a trunk until the bandits lift the cover, searching for the hidden gold. The sheriff's wife covers them with a revolver, until the sheriff returns with a posse and the men are taken into custody.

FOUND OUT (April 10).—What good is a name without the address? It proved almost to be a serious proposition with Mr. Carney. The newspapers had it that the maid in the Carney household was suing for breach of promise. Of course the ladies had to tell Mrs. Carney about it. The indignant Mrs. Carney locked her husband up in his room and commanded him to stay there. In the meantime officer McCarthy, smitten with Carney's maid, Hilda, is enjoying himself in the kitchen, filling the inner man with fried chicken and beer. The cat came out of the bag, however, when Mrs. McCarthy arrives on the scene and asks for her sweetheart. Mrs. Carney thinking she means her husband, unlocks the door and presents him to his supposed sweetheart. Things righten themselves when they discover the officer in the kitchen making love to Hilda. This comedy turns into a tragedy when Mrs. McCarthy sees her husband. It develops that the Mr. Carney mentioned in the paper is another man.

THE LITTLE MOTHER (April 11).—Through the death of her mother, Ethel McGuire is left to take care of her brother and two little sisters. Practically in destitute circumstances, a representative of the Cruelty to Children Prevention Society calls to take the children away from Ethel. She, however, does not allow the gentleman to take the children, having provided herself with a revolver borrowed from her neighbor upstairs. Two policemen are notified, who try in vain to accomplish what the representative had failed to do. They also are rebuked. Seeing the policemen on the street excited, a young fellow passing, takes it for granted that there is a fire in the building, and calls out the engines. The fire department arrives, they also are unsuccessful in their attempt. The Rev. McDonald, seeing the large crowd gathered about the tenement house, goes upstairs, where he sees Ethel protecting the young children with a revolver, from the now maddened throng, straightens things out to everybody's satisfaction.

BRONCHO BILLY'S REASON (April 12).—The infant love of a son for his mother, prompted Broncho Billy to secure money by fair means or foul to save her home. In the first place he sold his gun for almost nothing and gambled the receipts which he lost. That night, when all was still, Broncho Billy stole twelve horses, which he managed to take out of the pens and take to a neighboring town, where he sold them. The following morning the ranch owner discovering his loss, notifies a score of cowpunchers. They go in pursuit. Broncho Billy escapes. The horses are taken from the buyer and returned to their owner by the sheriff. Several months later the stock buyer receives a check from Broncho Billy, stating that "this will square things."

EDISON.

A SHOWER OF SLIPPERS (April 7).—The Rev. John Ashton, unmarried, has accepted a call in a village and, with his sister, gives a house warming. Mary, a young member of his flock, notices during the party, a pair of worn slippers and decides to make him a new pair. Consequently all the village spinsters also make slippers; but these the parson's sister trades off for a bread mixer to an itinerant peddler, who, innocently takes them around to the back doors through the community. Mary's slippers are the only ones the minister wears.

OLD JIM (April 8).—Old Jim nearly causes the downfall of himself and his son, who is boss in a quarry and who falls in love with Amy, daughter of Pearson, his employer. Pearson refuses to accept Old Jim's son. This makes Old Jim do better and he is able, when the chance comes to save Pearson's youngest daughter from the danger of a big blast at the risk of his life. This changes the face of the matter and gives a happy ending.

The clerk goes to the West and Marion, to be near him, persuades her father, by suggestion that makes him think himself sick, that he needs a vacation. They, too, go to California and there a brave young man rescues the daughter from drowning. The young man proves to be the clerk.

THE CAPTURE OF A WILD CAT (April 11).—Taken in the wilds of Colorado, this picture shows the chase, and capture, alive, of a very vicious and full grown wild cat. The picture opens with the discovery of an old settler that his chicken coop has again been the prey of a wild cat. The old man and his son put the dog on the trail and the chase begins. The hound corners the cat and a running fight ensues. The men now arrive with their lassos and get a rope around one leg of the cat. The cat leaps from the tree and becomes a fighting, struggling ball of fur. Finally, however, it is caught.

RULE THYSELF (April 11).—Poor Smilax flies into a rage upon the slightest provocation, and although he tries self-control one mishap after another falls upon him. Some unprincipled man steals his umbrella and when he attempts to board a trolley car the cruel motormen glide by with that stony stare. expectedly arrives home to find his wife being kissed and petted by a stranger his fortitude breaks down entirely and in spite of his wife's pleading the stranger is violently and unceremoniously pitched out of the house. After an explanation from his wife he is shocked to find that he has thrown out his wife's long lost brother who had come to bring them a fortune.

THE MAN WHO WOULDN'T MARRY (April 12).—Buckley, a wealthy bachelor, tells why he never married. In the story, he is selfish. At thirty, he is accepted by the daughter of a millionaire; but her father forbids the marriage. At forty-three, he meets, on the golf links, the right girl who is very friendly and even encourages him. He puts off asking her for one year, first for one year while he is saving money, and then a little longer, because he found just courting her, so pleasant. The jolt comes one evening when he finds that an old admirer of hers has come home from Australia and had been accepted. This shock leaves him a heart broken and prematurely aged man.

SELIG.

VENGEANCE IS MINE (April 7).—The film opens in a picturesque back street of a Spanish town, where an artist is busy at his easel. Chapo, the little hunchback, sees him and lingers by the artist. Pedestrians come and go and push him aside, but the boy is oblivious to everything but the painter and his magic. The art of the painter arouses a great latent gift in the hunchback. He so strongly covets artists materials in the store of a curio dealer that he tries to steal them and is caught. A kind padre, himself an artist, rescues him from the irate dealer and teaches him to draw and paint. One day in the mission garden he sees lovely Eleanor, who becomes the idol of his dreams, the inspiration of his brush. She has, unfortunately, given herself to the profligate, Arguello, who abandons her. Chapo takes her to his own poor quarters and cares for her. Two years later she dies, and the hunchback, still rising in the world of art, adopts the two-year-old daughter.

The scene advances twenty years. Chapo, the once neglected and despised, is a giant in the world of Parisian art and the adopted daughter has grown to be a beautiful young woman. They return to the old home, and there is Arguello, living a cumberer of the ground in his old age of vice, cards and liquor. He still has eyes and he leers upon the fair young flower leaning on the arm of Chapo. The indignant old padre calls on Arguello exclaiming, "she is your child." The shock and shame finally overcame him and he dies on the spot.

ROBERT HALE'S AMBITION (April 8).—The boy friends of Robert Hale inspire his curious ambitions with glowing tales of college life. He starts such moody moping his loving old mother is alarmed, and in response to her importunate inquiries be tells her he wants to go to college. He goes away in great glee and she gets a position in the mill to help out expenses. Wearily at work she pictures him the valedictorian of his class, loaded with honors; but he is a "bummer," not a "dig," and when his means are exhausted, he begins to squeeze money out of her. Finally, as it does not come fast enough, he wires her he has broken his leg and must have $50.00 at once. She mortgages the place, goes to his assistance, and finds him holding high revel. He gets the money and lectures her, she returning home in dreadful distress. When he gets expelled from college he comes to his senses, rushes home to his mother's assistance. She forgives him all the trouble he has caused her and they begin the life of struggle anew.

THE SHOTGUN MAN AND THE STAGE-DRIVER (April 9).—The Brave old days of stage-coaching through the mountains were full of bounce, not to remark the jolts of variety, and plenty of danger to spice what now is monotony in travel. The drift of this story with danger ever eminent, has plentiful spice of comedy, diversified by daring and wild, exciting drives. It was a time when men thought quick and shot quick, self-preservation being Nature's first law. The stage-coach, having the precious freight of two fair girls and much of Uncle Sam's mail, goes through on schedule time, despite the fact that a band of outlaws leagued to capture the mail coach. The shotgun man and the driver manage to thwart the plans of the badmen without blood-shed. The company give them ample reward for bringing the mail on time, but more surprising and acceptable is the reward of the fair ones whose lives were saved by their brave guardians.

TOMMY'S ATONEMENT (April 10).—Tommy Hale, in the exuberance of unrestrained youth, makes "rough house" in his own home with such vigor that he smashes a valuable vase. In thus entertaining himself he is frequently admonished by Mrs. Graves to be careful. When she returns to the room after a moment's absence, she finds that the frightened Tommy has vanished and the beautiful vase a mass of wreckage on the hearthstone. Mrs. Hale happens in at this moment, and without giving credence to the old lady, discharges her on the spot. She goes to her poor tenement and finds her feeble husband, who earns a precarious living as a wandering musician. Threatened with eviction, he starts out to try and pay the rent overdue. He is run down by the sled of the reckless Tommy and his violin is shattered. The aged and injured musician is carried into the Graves' home. Tommy, thoroughly repentant, empties his savings-bank, buys a new violin and tells his mother how he broke the vase. His father and mother are now so awakened to the forlorn situation of the aged couple that they give them a home for life.

WITH LOVE'S EYES (April 11).—Virginia, who was born the sweetheart of Charles, since the early days of their youth, becomes obsessed with the idea that he loves her for her beauty alone and fears that it will fade. The stalwart Charles, who is a fireman, unconsciously impresses this upon her as he is always taking snap-shots of her and has an artist paint her portrait. A theatrical manager makes her a star, and her humble lover sees her rising above his station. The artist falls in love with her and idolizes her as his masterpiece. Virginia's home burns and she is rescued by the gallant Charles, who almost loses his life and is blinded. Virginia, recovering, sends him a note releasing him from his engagement, and the artist, whose ardor has cooled, tells her that her beauty has been destroyed forever. Fate brings Charles and Virginia together for a happy life until death overtakes them.

THE MAGIC SHOES (April 10).—Pete Smiley, a shoemaker, is in the habit of coming home from his night haunts and cronies pretty late, and with a twenty-two carat jag. He also indulges in booze fighting in the day-time. One day he comes home in a befuddled condition and his wife tries to impress her views on his brain. He smiles and peacefully falls asleep. He dreams that he is in one of his favorite saloons and while imbibing ale, a fairy appears and gives him a pair of shoes. She tells him that the left one will cause the wearer to disappear, the right one to cause her to reappear. He hurries home and gives his wife the shoes. Trying on the left, she disappears, much to Pete's satisfaction. He throws the right shoe in the river, wondering what will happen. He is rudely awakened by his wife and berated for his idleness.

A CHANGE OF ADMINISTRATION (Special—2 parts—April 5).—As politics decree, Warren, the chief clerk in the war office, is supplanted by Lester. Before Warren leaves, the retiring Secretary of War gives him a sealed document—a valuable formula of a high explosive which the government has just acquired; for safe keeping. Warren places it in the safe just as his sweetheart, Inez, who is the daughter of the Mexican ambassador, appears. Her curiosity leads Warren to tell her all concerning the document. Inez intuitively doubts the honesty of Lester whom she meets at a broker's office, and where she admits that she is a foreign spy. Lester is so impressed with her charms that, as planned, he meets her at the Inaugural Ballroom where she intentionally drops her silken handbag. Still following out their plans, this is picked up by Lester who, in a round about way, manages to get the precious document he has stolen into the bag which he returns to Inez. Part of this procedure was observed by Warren who, after the ball, escorts her home where he discovers the stolen documents. Before explanations can take place, Inez's father appears and Warren leaves. Just as Warren is about to retire he receives a note from Inez, reading: "If, before I should see you in the morning, you should be caught with that document, say you got it from me and I will do the rest." He tears the note to pieces.

The next morning in the war office, Lester being unable to find the document, accuses Warren who is arrested at the hotel. The detectives find the document under his pillow. Warren is then brought to the anteroom of the War Secretary, where he confronts Lester and accuses him of having stolen the document. This leads the Judicial Secretary to remark, "If he stole it, how came it in your possession." Not wishing to incriminate his sweetheart, Warren refuses to talk further. But Inez, who heard part of the conversation, throws this note from behind the portieres: "The guilty one is the new chief clerk, a woman trapped him with marked money." The detectives get busy and bring in Inez. They are about to place her under arrest when the secretary orders that Lester be searched. He confesses and is told to go. Inez's story of how she trapped him is so powerful that Warren is reinstated.

BIOGRAPH.

THE STOLEN BRIDE (April 7).—The overseer is in love with the orange grower's daughter, but one of the employees is also infatuated with her. The employee forces his unwelcome attentions upon the girl, which results in his being discharged. He vows vengeance against the overseer and on the day of their wedding, seizes the bride and carries her off to a cave in the mountains, from which she is rescued by the husband and a pursuing party. The disgruntled employee almost paid for his intended act of vengeance with his life.

AN "UNCLE TOM'S CABIN" TROUPE (April 10).—The "Uncle Tom's Cabin" troupe arrives in town and gives a show. The hotel proprietor is so impressed with it that he swaps his hotel for the troupe, but the outcome is disastrous, forcing him to admit "Evil the day that I became an actor."

A LESSON TO MASHERS (April 10).—Fastidious Ferdinand haunts the steam laundry where a host of pretty girls is employed. He tries to force his attentions upon one of them, for which he is taught a lesson that he will never forget.

THE LITTLE TEASE (April 12).—The supposition was that she was born a tease, for from her first teeth to the time she was almost grown, she vented her witcheries on her unsuspecting parents and the wild things of her mountain home. But that was before the man from the valley lost his way and later found it back again, bearing away the little tease to the valley. While she suffered the qualms of broken faith, her father passed through a like struggle, for he felt the precepts of the "beloved book" had failed him. He closed the door of his cabin upon the world and the light from his window, lighting the wayfarer over the mountain path, disappeared. The struggle over, it came back in its place in time to beckon the little tease as she left the valley behind.

PATHEPLAY.

PATHE'S WEEKLY No. 14, 1913 (Mar. 31).—

New York, N. Y.—Thirty-five thousand parade in the St. Patrick's day celebration.

Melbourne, Australia.—The Regatta on the Yarra River is largely attended.

Erie, Pa.—The Niagara, the famous flagship of Commodore Perry in the war with England in 1812, is being raised, after resting 100 years at the bottom of Lake Erie.

Mexico City, Mexico.—The ruined buildings and the many gruesome sights and incidents in this city are constant reminders of the overthrow of the Madero government.

Berlin, Germany.—The Kaiser and the Kaiserin assist at the fete given by the students of the University of Berlin.

Moscow, Russia.—Four thousand actors gather at the Kremlin to take part in the making of a Pathe play of the 300th anniversary of the Royal House of Romanoff.

London, England.—The Suffragette window breaking proclivities result in some specimens of humor which relieve the situation a little.

And Many Others.

THE SNAP-SHOT (April 8).—His wife attracting so much attention at a ball, Dr. Ballincourt became so jealous that he decided to test his wife's love. Accordingly, he addressed a note in endearing terms to her, begging a smile, and signing himself A. D. T., care of General Delivery. He asked his friend, Paul McWilliams, a married man, to collect any replies to the note. Mrs. Ballincourt, anxious to learn the author of the note, employs a detective to take a snap-shot of the gentleman inquiring for letters addressed to A. D. T. McWilliams and his wife are calling on Dr. Ballincourt and his wife when the snap-shot arrives. It looks pretty bad for McWilliams and the situation is sure to provoke uproarious laughter. The difficulty is straightened out, however, and the men are forgiven by their better halves.

THE RIVER CLYDE AT LANARK, SCOTLAND (April 8).—A beautiful river in beautiful Scotland, beautifully colored.

TOO MUCH PARCEL POST (April 9).—William Jones, postman No. 1144, because of fifteen years' faithful service, is promoted to the new parcel post branch. He is highly delighted until he learns what he has to carry and deliver, the most peculiar combination of commodities conceivable. Eggs, dynamite, a stove, a goat, a baby carriage, a pig, a baby, and others too numerous to mention. On his route the eggs hatch out and the baby begins to scream. You can imagine the predicament of the poor parcel postman! A woman passer-by objects to the manner in which he handles the baby and he runs before her torrent of abuse. When she corners him and strikes him the almost forgotten dynamite explodes. No wonder Jones resigned.

GOD IS LOVE (April 10).—This film is the enactment of Count Tolstoi's famous story of the Russian shoemaker who despaired of God's assistance in the time of his need. Grief stricken by the death of his wife and child, Ivan rages against Fate's unkindness until a Visitation opens his eyes and his heart to the truth. The Lord promises Ivan to visit him again and the shoemaker humbly awaits his coming. Several objects of charity cross Ivan's path. He treats them gently and generously and upon the return of the Visitation, learns that they were God Himself. The fact that the story is one of the most popular products of the pen of the famous Russian philosopher is a guarantee to the quality of the film and added to this the acting of a capable company leaves nothing to be desired to make an attractive offering.

THE ANALYSIS OF MOTION (April 11).—This is the most remarkable film that we have ever offered, as it is an entirely new development in cinematography. The camera, taking pictures at the almost incredible speed of twelve hundred per second, shows the trajectory of a bullet at a rate of speed reduced so as to enable spectators to witness just what takes place when the bullet leaves the gun, the course it describes through the air, how it strikes (a clay pipe in one experiment),

THE HAPPY HOME (April 12).—The wreck of the schooner "Crusoe," when it is reported in the papers, deals a death blow to the dreams of Marion Clayton, for the man whom she was to marry was on board. Some time later William Hummel, a less-favored suitor, renews his plea for Marion's hand and wins. Barton, meanwhile, has managed to live through the wreck of the "Crusoe," and after several months he returns to the port from which the "Crusoe" sailed. There he learns of Marion's engagement to his rival. To find out if she has forgotten him and really loves his successor, he masquerades as a stranger. His adventure has a dramatic climax when he is forced to disclose his identity. However, it is by this incident that he learns that he is necessary to the happiness of Marion and the making of a happy home.

KALEM.

IN THE GRIP OF A CHARLATAN (April 7).—Anne Sinclair, a young heiress, becomes interested in a new cult, sponsored by the Swami Baroudi, a clever fakir, who claims to be versed in the occult. The attendance of Barondi's demonstrations become quite a fad and the knave, with the assistance of confederates, apparently effects some wonderful cures. Baroudi is not without a certain hypnotic power, and when Anne visits his parlors with friends, she is placed under his spell. The Swami quietly commands the girl to bring him her necklace that night. She goes home in a daze, which her companions attribute to the impressive ceremonies.

Promptly at ten Anne appears at Baroudi's with her necklace. He takes the jewels, and conceiving a daring scheme for further extortion, plans to have her remain. Louise, a servant devoted to Baroudi, raises a disturbance, which brings Anne to her senses. The terrified girl attempts to escape and Barondi, knowing he will be prosecuted, forcibly detains Anne and locks her in a room.

Anne's fiancé, Robert, and her father become alarmed when she does not return. They engage detectives, who are unable to determine her whereabouts. Meanwhile, Anne, in desperation, has secured a dagger from Louise, fully determined to take her life if Barondi does not liberate her.

Fortunately Robert finds in his pocket the Swami's card, which Anne has given him, and full of apprehension he leads the officers to the address. The charlatan resorts to all manner of subterfuges, but is taken into custody, and Anne is liberated from the scoundrel's prison just as she is about to abandon hope.

THE PURSUIT OF THE SMUGGLERS (April 9).—James Peyton, a young Internal Revenue Officer of unusual resource, is sent to investigate the operations of a band of daring liquor smugglers and bring about their apprehension. In order that he may not arouse suspicion, Peyton secures employment at a village store, and while engaged in his duties as clerk he gains the friendship of Marcella, the storekeeper's daughter. But in forming the acquaintance, Peyton makes an enemy in Poole, a rough character, who has been endeavoring to win Marcella's hand. Poole is the leader of the smugglers and his association soon becomes known to the vigilant officer.

One day, while delivering a basket of groceries, Peyton encounters the smugglers and is made prisoner. He is bound and led to an attic room. Struggling desperately with his bonds, Peyton manages to secure a small pocket mirror from his pocket and flashes a heliograph message to the revenue cutter down the bay.

Meanwhile, Marcella, who has been expecting Peyton to call, becomes alarmed at his absence, knowing that he has recently had an altercation with Poole. She warns her cousin, Ben, and by making inquiry, they learn where the officer was seen last. Peyton is discovered in the attic window by Ben, who climbs the porch and assists the officer to escape.

Hearing the disturbance the smugglers take to flight and when the cutter comes steaming up the river in response to Peyton's message, the officer, together with Marcella and Ben, is taken aboard. There is an exciting pursuit, in which the smugglers, in a tugboat cast out a net and entangle the propeller of the cutter, but the lawbreakers are finally captured and Peyton receives two rewards.

THE SCIMITAR OF THE PROPHET (April 11).—While touring Egypt, Harris and his wife visit an old temple and are fascinated by a sacred scimitar, which, at the corner of a shrine, is religiously guarded by Hadjji, a Mohammedan priest. The wife is a curio fiend, and demands that Harris secure the scimitar, but the husband, having read in his guidebook that the scimitar was supposedly presented to the prophet in a vision and that the vengeance of Allah will follow whosoever disturbs it, begs her to abandon the foolish idea. She insists. That night Harris enters the temple with a rope ladder, steals the scimitar and escapes. In his flight he loses his hat, which is found by the horrified Hadjji.

Hadjji follows the tourists to America, and posing as a rug merchant, gains access to their house, where the vengeance of Allah is fulfilled.

THE INDESTRUCTIBLE MR. JENKS (April 11).—Mr. Jenks, completing a series of experiments, which render him indestructible, empties some chemicals into the kitchen stove. There is a terrific explosion and Mrs. Jenks is surprised to find her husband uninjured.

A thug attacks Jenks and is extremely puzzled when his bludgeon has no effect. A steam roller runs over the indestructible gentleman, whose tranquility is not disturbed in the least. Even a wheelbarrow load of bricks dropped on Jenks' head does not injure him. But when Mrs. Jenks, having baked some biscuits, inadvertently drops them out of the window, Jenks, homeward bound, meets his Waterloo.

THE CALIFORNIA OIL CROOKS (April 12).—George Cresswell has bravely endeavored to strike oil, but with no success, and he is therefore greatly surprised when Todd, a promoter, arrives on the scene and offers to buy his land. Naturally Cresswell believes the promoter is endeavoring to perpetrate a joke at his expense, little knowing that Todd and a confederate have made a careful inspection of the land and formed a daring plot to tap a neighboring pipe. Cresswell's protests are subdued when Todd declares that he is willing to take a chance and the sale is effected.

The plot is then placed in execution. Todd and his assistants tap the pipe line under the cover of darkness, and cleverly extend a line to the worthless property, where it is connected with an abandoned derrick. A few days later the community is astonished by the news that the old Cresswell land has become a fertile oil field, and an inspection verifies the report.

Todd organizes a company and offers stock for sale. He is able to command large figures, but in his plans he makes one mistake. He engages Cresswell's sweetheart, Nelly Brown, as stenographer, and the girl discovers evidences of her employer's criminal practices. She promptly warns Cresswell, and together they proceed to the derrick.

The promoter, finding his operations have been discovered, destroys the derrick by an explosion of dynamite and Cresswell and Nelly are imprisoned by the flames. Their rescue is effected and the California oil crooks are brought to justice.

PURE GOLD AND DROSS (April 13).—A young man possessed of moderate means, meets a young actress. The infatuation is mutual and a hasty marriage is the result. The couple go to the West, where the man gets into the clutches of a mining shark, who takes his money in exchange for mining land which he firmly believes to be of no value.

Following a year of hopeless endeavor and useless, unremitting toil, they are left penniless—and to add to their cares, a baby has arrived and must be provided for. A big-hearted man takes a fancy to the young husband and assists him. The husband shows his gratitude both to the man and to his daughter, and his attitude toward this girl is misunderstood by the suffering wife.

The unwarranted and cruel gossip of the thoughtless villagers strengthens her suspicions, and her state of health, the death of her babe and poverty leave her despondent, and it only takes a letter of invitation from her former friends to decide her to go quietly away. She sells her engagement ring to pay for her passage and goes.

The husband, on his way home, wanders by the river bank and discovers the gold he has been seeking for so long. He hurries on to tell his wife the glad news and finds her gone. He is heartbroken, and although the source of the gold is traced and he achieves wealth, it is all as nothing to him in the loss of his wife. He stands it as long as he can and decides to end it all. The wife, unable to bear the thought of him there in his loneliness, and longing for the freedom of the hills, returns in time to prevent a tragedy—and all is well.

CRYSTAL.

OUR PARENTS-IN-LAW (April 13).—Harry and Carrie are married. Carrie's mother pays them a visit. She and Harry do not get along together. Harry is smoking a cigar when Ma enters the room. She immediately takes the cigar from him and makes him throw same out of the window, at the same time forbidding him to smoke in the house again. Harry's father, who has never met his wife, decides to pay the happy couple a visit. He arrives, and, as luck would have, they are not home, mother being in sole possession of the house. Father mistakes Carrie's mother for his wife and upon entering hugs and kisses her. She repulses him and slaps his face. Carrie and Harry come home and find Ma indignant in her room. Carrie explains that the man is Harry's father. Mother comes into the parlor, and finding father smoking, tries the same game on him that worked so well on Harry. However, she finds a tartar in the old man, and admits inwardly that she has met her match. However, the young couple decide to put up a game on them. They write letters, one signing Pa's name, in which he writes that he loves Carrie's Ma, and vice versa. They leave these letters where the couple can find the ones intended for them, which they do. The old fellow immediately becomes frisky and the escapade winds up with them marrying, and Harry and Carrie giving them a great send-off.

THE VEILED LADY (April 13).—Chester is paying attention to Pearl. Despite this, he persists in flirting with every pretty girl he sees. Pearl's friend, Mabel, after visiting Pearl, meets Chester, who is on his way to see Pearl. He immediately follows her, but she will not flirt with him. The next day Chester again visits Pearl and Mable calls. She sees Chester and immediately tells Pearl about him. Pearl decides to work a game on him. After he has gone she writes him a note, asking him to meet her the next afternoon, and signs her name to the missive. She dresses her colored maid in some finery and putting a veil on her, induces her to go to the meeting place. Chester, tired of waiting, sees the maid come along, and follows her. She speaks to him and he walks her home. Meanwhile, Pearl and Mabel have followed them, as does Mr. Johnson, the maid's fellow, who has penetrated her disguise. The maid takes Chester home, and he, never recognizing the house, enters with her. Pearl and Mabel go in, while the angry Mr. Johnson remains outside. Pearl confronts him and demands to know who the woman is. He claims it is his sister until Pearl takes the maid's veil off and he sees that he has been flirting with a coon. He rushes pell mell out of the house entirely cured of his flirting habits. Mr. Johnson, waiting outside,, assails him with cane, and Chester runs for his life, while the girls inside are enjoying a huge laugh at his expense.

ECLAIR.

GOING FOR FATHER (April 13).—Father didn't get home from work and mother had supper ready. Dad was a working man, and when he stopped at the sitting room of the little corner saloon some of the boys invited him to join them in a little card game.

Mother sent little Clara and Willie to bring father home when the clock pointed to 7:30, but there was a piano in this sitting room and some music, and so the youngsters began to enjoy things. Eight o'clock and no father and no children. So mother sent Muriel, 8:30 and no Muriel, no father and no children, so grandpa was sent. As each one arrived, the gay little gathering in the sitting room invited them to become members of the party, and they began to have such a pleasant time that they forgot about supper being ready. The soup began to boil over, and so Grandma was sent. But when Grandma arrived there were some traveling musicians playing in the sitting room and she too joined in the gaiety.

Finally mother herself decided to go. A timid policeman heard the uproar, when mother found the whole family having such a good time, she began to give them a piece of her mind. Mr. Cop thought it was a riot and calling some assistance, the entire family was arrested.

On the way to the police station, they saw great clouds of smoke coming out of their home, and every one went to the rescue to put out the fire. After fighting their way through the dense smoke into the kitchen, they discovered that it was only the soup that had boiled over.

THE OCTOPUS (April 13).—The octopus is found on the coasts of the tropical zones, frequenting the rocky shores, and it is exceptionally active. They are regularly placed on sale in the markets of Smyrna and Naples and the bazaars of India.

WITHIN THE LIMIT OF THE LAW (2 parts—April 9).—Doctor Marien had a happy home. One day he accompanied Mrs. Marien to the dressmaker's and was attracted by a model, who was willing that the doctor should notice her glances. The next day the same model, Stella, delivered at the doctor's home his wife's new gown, and in doing so found time to ensnare the surgeon.

The model soon found herself the mistress of a beautiful apartment, and her extravagance began to cause Marien considerable worry. Stella wanted to become an actress and with the backing of Doctor Marien she was given an opportunity. The day following, Stella accompanied the doctor to the Hippodrome, where, during the performance, there was a terrible catastrophe. One of the galleries collapsed and a number of persons were injured, among them the Countess de Vilmir. Doctor Marien was called to give his aid to the unfortunate victim. In spite of the efforts of Doctor Legios, the family physician, the Countess de Vilmir did not improve as rapidly as had been expected. Dr. Legios decided that it would be advisable to call in again the celebrated surgeon, Dr. Marien.

At the first consultation, Dr. Marien decided that an operation was not necessary and he wrote a letter to the Countess, explaining his decision. Before this letter was mailed, however, he received a note from Stella demanding that he send her $6000 immediately. After a terrible half hour in his study the specialist decided that he would perform an operation upon the Countess immediately, and so he wrote to her physician to bring her to his hospital the following day. The operation was performed and the results were fatal. The Countess' son was almost frantic with grief to learn of his sudden bereavement, and when Dr. Marien, on leaving the operating room, saw the boy he realized the terrible crime he had committed. The next day, when Stella called for her money, the doctor upbraided her, and in the midst of a terrible scene old Dr. Legios happened to come to the door on a call to visit the specialist. He overheard the conversation, and rushing into the room denounced the specialist as a murderer.

Dr. Legios informed the Count de Vilmir of the fact that his mother had been the victim of an unnecessary operation, but when the Count called upon his attorney he was told that there was no way to reach such a criminal. The Count decided that he could at least publicly disgrace Dr. Marien, and so he went to a hall where the specialist was delivering a lecture and here confronted him before this gathering, and publicly declared that he had committed the crime of operating unnecessarily on his mother.

The result was absolute disgrace for Dr. Marien. When he turned to Stella, she also scorned his attentions now that his money and prestige were gone.

THE MAID AND THE MILKMAN (April 7).—Mamma and her two girls are in the park, all very stylish, especially the eldest daughter, who is conscious of her station in life and adds dignity to her years. Louise, the younger, is just roguish and pretty. Edward Girard notes this as he passes and Louise notices him. She drops a package in a shameless manner, and so gets into conversation. Edward obtains an invitation to call. But scheming mamma sees a last chance of marrying off her elder daughter. She, therefore, insists upon dressing her rebellious younger girl as a maid. Edward is bored to distraction and is properly mad when the simpering elder daughter appropriates the five dollar bouquet he brought Louise. But he overhears a fragment of conversation between Louise and mamma and he "tumbles." As he goes, he bestows a meaning wink upon Louise and she too knows.

Edward holds up a milk wagon for a consideration, borrows the milkman's hat and apron and his cart. He gains an entrance into the kitchen and is caught by mamma flirting with the "maid." He assures her he is the milkman and mamma flounces out in a rage at being so deceived. Louise agrees to a ride, and off they go. Mamma sees them and pursues in an auto. The audacious and presuming "milk man" pulls up before a fine residence, and mamma finds Edward and Louise in the embrace of another mamma—Edward's, and she recognizes an old and wealthy friend. All are now satisfied except the elder daughter.

HOW FATTY GOT EVEN (April 9).—Amos, the old storekeeper receives a letter from his friend James, telling him that as Bill has passed away, they are sending his daughter, Birdie, to Amos, as per agreement. Great excitement reigns, as Birdie will be the first woman in the new town. They prepare a little shack for her, and each in turn try to win her good graces as soon as she arrives, even the old storekeeper taking a hand, but he eventually withdraws, considering himself too old. He now suggests to Tim and Andy that they pretend to shoot each other in a duel, since the one she loves will be the one she goes to first. Accordingly the boys get paint and fix up wounds, while Amos sends Fatty, to notify Birdie. The girl comes and is shocked at what she believes is a tragedy, but instead of going to either Tim or Andy, she turns to Fatty for comfort, and after discovering that the boys were only shamming, goes off with her a very much elated young man.

THE FORGOTTEN LETTER (April 11).—Robert Lee is deeply in love with Margaret Ellison. Both are undemonstrative, and Robert, not feeling quite sure that he possesses Margaret's heart, delays his proposal. He is called imperatively to New York and writes a letters to Margaret asking her to be his wife and this he places in his pocket to mail. But his valet points out that he has his wrong coat on. He changes it hastily and starts for the railroad station. Arriving in New York, he awaits patiently for the answer which never comes. Robert is terribly grieved and decides that Margaret did not love him sufficiently to marry him. He instructs his valet, Parker to close the house, to remove everything to New York and to offer the place for sale.

Margaret wonders why she has neither seen nor heard from the man to whom she is so deeply attached and is shocked when she sees the empty house and the "For Sale" sign, as she drives up to inquire the cause of his absence. The years pass and Margaret accepts a rich suitor, who later dies. She still cherishes the memory of Robert, who also is constantly thinking of days gone by and of her. One day he decides to rummage through old trunks, and finds the letter he wrote to Margaret thirty years ago. He decides to call upon her and in her own home to at least explain. The years have not stolen any of Margaret's charm. She is surprised and pleased to see him. He explains the missing letter. They decide to remain inseparate forevermore.

POWERS.

THE FEAR (April 11).—Hugh Webster is a strong man in all but the control of a violent temper. He does not possess the saving grace of humor, and his companions subject him to many jokes which he does not accept with good grace. While upon a hunting trip, he one day lets his temper assert itself, and in a frenzy, strikes down his best friend. Then seeing what he has done, flees in terror into the depths of the forest.

His friend is not badly injured, and as all feel sorry for their conduct and know that their chaff was ill-advised, they endeavor to find him, well knowing that if he is lost his chances for remaining alive are very slim. They get near him at times, but haunted with awful fear and believing that he is hunted, he eludes them and eventually throws them off the scent and gets lost.

He is found in an exhausted condition by the dog of a lumberman and is rescued by the man, who takes him to the lumber camp. He gets word that his friend is all right, and returns home a cured man and with his temper forever in check.

AS FATE WILLS, a drama (April 10).—Ill and homeless, Jack Sheldon, is walking the streets, begging, accompanied by his little child Edythe. Their appeals for assistance meet with no response until Mrs. Preston, picks them up in her automobile. In the machine, Sheldon becomes delirious and is taken to a hospital, where laboring under a strange hallucination, he escapes and wanders in a demented condition, to a sheepherder's camp, where he obtains protection. Recovering from the delirium and regaining his strength, Sheldon is about to depart from the camp, when the returning goatherder falls from a high rock, receiving injuries which prove fatal. Nursed by Sheldon, the goat herder before dying, leaves Sheldon all his earthly possessions. Little Edythe, has been adopted by Mrs. Preston and has forgotten her parentage.

Fifteen years after, she and her girl friends go picnicing in the mountains, near Sheldon's camp. Sheldon enters into a conversation with her. As the girl leaves the camp, Sheldon utters a prayer that his girl, wherever she may be, is safe from harm.

Sheldon now discovers a placer goldfield; is possessed of much wealth and is determined to find his daughter. He sees Mrs. Preston and Edythe enter their motor car. Edythe loses her purse. Sheldon finds it in the street and traces them by means of a visiting card.

He feels sure the Edythe is his daughter, and tells to Mrs. Preston and her the story of his life and adventures from the time he escaped from the hospital, gradually leading up to the climax, which he springs when he declares that if Edythe will look on her arm in a certain place, she will find a scar of a certain description. The girl slowly puts her arms around her father's neck. Sheldon assures Mrs. Preston of his gratitude to her and of his wealth and ability to care for the girl. Edythe and her father are reunited.

THE BURNING LARIAT (April 12). — Burt Hawkins, an eastern cattle buyer in New Mexico, closes a deal with Sam French, a western stock grazer and is introduced by French to his daughter, Edith, who is talking with Buck, French's foreman. It is a case of love-at-first-sight between Edith and Burt. Buck becomes jealous; indicates his dislike for Burt and quarrels with Edith leaving in an angry mood.

Developments are rapid in the case. Burt tells the girl he loves her. Felipe, a sheep herder and Buck's pal, overhears an agreement between the lovers to meet. Felipe informs Buck and they decide to get square with Burt. While waiting at the meeting place, Burt is overpowered and bound; Edith arrives soon after, picking up a glove which she identifies as Burt's and which he has dropped in the struggle, also a spur belonging to Buck. She follows the foot prints and reaches the abandoned adobe shack where Felipe and Buck have imprisoned Burt. Securing a lariat, Edith ropes Felipe, who gives a frightened yell which attracts Buck's attention; Buck comes from the shack and as he opens the door Edith attempts to shoot him, but is overpowered and made prisoner with Burt. With Edith at his mercy, Buck tells her if she does not consent to marry him he will fix Burt. Buck instructs Felipe to take Burt to the old barn near by; place him inside and fire the barn. With Burt a sure prisoner, Edith persists in her refusal to wed Buck until she sees the barn burning and then consents to marry Buck. But she snatches Buck's revolver, forces him into the shack and goes to assist Burt. Buck is released by Felipe; they swear vengeance and with the assistance of sheep herders start in pursuit of Edith and Burt who have by this time traveled a considerable distance over a rough road, being given a passage in a rough stage coach.

A running fight follows. Arriving at a precipice, with no outlet for escape, Edith takes a desperate chance: ties a lariat to a rock and throws the end over the cliff. She descends, followed by Burt. Buck and his men reach the precipice and Buck attempts the same route of descent. The end of the lariat is lighted, flames quickly consume the rope. Buck discovers too late that the rope is quickly burning and despite of frantic efforts to gain the top of the precipice he is dashed to the depth of the canyon. The sheriff arrives and arrests the herders.

THE WANDERER (April 7).—In the valley the world's best "eternal triangle" is being worked between a husband, a much younger wife and "one who covets." On the heights, the shepherd hears the call and for the nonce becomes a wanderer, and descends into the valley of Passions and Pain. It is the gentle, unfelt, almost unseen influence of the wanderer that stops a maddened husband from first murder and then suicide; exposes the frailty of a wife to her own consideration, and points out to her the grim consequences of a moment's folly, and finally takes the "one who covets" away from the born passions of the valley a far journey up the heights, and disaster to three souls. Averted, the wanderer, again the good shepherd, returns to his peaceful grazingship.

But Ralph merely sends the gardner for her. This time she makes up her mind that she will get even. Seeing her father give some money to Ralph, she manages to get it and hide it. Ralph is horrified at the disappearance of the money, but he is not believed and Alice's father discharges him at once.

A few days later as he is wheeling his mother along the street in her invalid chair, Alice's motor car crashes into them. The mother is hurt but recovers. The girl's devotion to his mother wins Ralph's heart and before long the past is entirely forgotten and a bright future looms before them.

AMERICAN.

CUPID THROWS A BRICK (April 7).—Jim Reynolds worked in the village brickyard. Jim loved Mabel Whitaker very much, but Mabel gave her affection to Bob Warren. One day Jim saw Bob go into a saloon. He remonstrated and Bob advised him to mind his own business. The following day, in the brickyard Bob hauled a flask from his pocket. Jim took it from him. Bob picked up a brick and heaved it. Jim got hit on the side of his head and for days was missed at his work.

Jim saw much of Mabel and Mabel's faith in Bob waned in proportion as she grew to love Jim. A day came when the boys caught Bob. They were treating him roughly when Jim interfered and bid them leave Bob alone. They left and Mabel came. Bob, who had thought Jim dead, was so overcome as to offer his hand. For reply Jim stooped, picked up another brick and handed it to him with a look at Mabel, saying, "Hit me again, Bob, and maybe she'll marry me."

THE HOMESTEAD RACE (April 10).—Ben Halliday came to the Big N ranch for rest. He soon fell in love with charming Carrie Wilkins, daughter of the ranchowner. She showed him a letter from Jim Wells, the distant land agent, telling her that she could obtain an excellent homestead if she hurried on at once.

Ralph Cunningham overheard the conversation, and later, a gust of wind swept the letter out of the open window to him. He picked it up, saw that he had sufficient money to file himself, and rushed for the barn to get a horse. Meanwhile, the letter was missed and the empty stable gave a reason.

Then Ben Halliday took a hand. He found another horse and a mighty chase ensued. Over hill and dale the pair galloped, until, overtaken, Ralph got off his horse, held Ben at the point of his gun, took Ben's horse and made away. But all luck had not deserted the apparent loser. Stopping a passing automobile, he climbed in and again overtook his enemy. Both arrived at practically the same time at Wells' office. Ben, a fraction of an instant ahead, leaped in and bolted the door. After the necessary papers had been made out, Wells gave him his gun. Ben crept around to the front of the house and got the drop on Ralph, who stood, revolver in hand, confronting the door.

WOMAN'S HONOR (April 12).—Madge Williams, a shawl about her figure, crept into the little town, a cast off woman. Billy Wayne made love to Jessalyn on the front porch of the rector's house and Father Bob, the handsome young priest, stopped to smile at the evident love of Billy and the coquetry of Jessalyn.

A week later young Benton was making violent love to Jessalyn and Father Bob frowned, for Benton was a backslider and bore a bad reputation in town. Meanwhile, Madge Williams sought out Benton, her destroyer, and begged him to marry her. But he had cast her off and refused. The climax came when Jessalyn, with a small package under her arm, fled with Benton. The priest saw and followed to the little village park. The four met, a priest, a backslider and an innocent girl and a woman who had been wronged. Words, hot and hasty, followed. Benton struck at the priest, and priest became man, delivering a blow which laid Benton flat upon the grass. When he rose the priest joined his hand with that of Madge and made them man and wife. Just then the village sexton, father of Jessalyn, hurried to the scene, gun in hand. But the affair was over for Jessalyn, and she went quietly back home with her father. Father Bob took his way and the man and woman, newly made man and wife, faced each other. And the woman smiled, kissed her ring and bade him farewell forever.

THANHOUSER.

THE WAX LADY (March 30).—There was once a cross grumpy man who owned a cheap little clothing store. He acted as his own "puller in," because he enjoyed annoying people and inducing them to pay high prices for second class goods. He was overbearing to the poor, brutal to children and never happy except when he saw somebody suffering. His neighbors all hated him, but had given him up as a bad job. Consequently they were very much surprised to notice a sudden radical change in him. He became kindly instead of cruel, benevolent instead of penurious and tried in every way to be a benefactor to all mankind. They couldn't understand it and the mystery was not lightened when he unbosomed himself to a friend. "You see it was this way," he said. "I got in bad with the queen of the fairies and she put me over the jumps. See that wax lady in there? Well, she came to life and so did those other dummies and I found out after they had tortured me a while that I was a pretty bad lot. So now I am a good scout and I am going to keep on being one, for if I don't that fairy queen will come back."

The merchant never relaxes in his efforts to please the fairies, for the experiences he had were so fearful that he will never forget them.

THE WOMAN WHO DID NOT CARE (April 1).—A girl beautiful but heartles and ambitious, was the daughter of a poor miner and was devotedly loved by a man in her own station of life. She accepted his attentions willingly until a young engineer came along and paid court to her. She then dismissed her first suitor. Her father made a lucky strike, and they moved to the city to enjoy their wealth. This sealed the fate of the second suitor, for a rich man became smitten with the girl and she accepted his advances. Perhaps she would have married him in time had it not been that she aroused the enmity of an old witch, deeply skilled in magic. The witch, to have revenge, brought a scarecrow to life, supplied him with a title and seeming great wealth, and ordered him to win the girl for his bride. He did this easily, for the idea of being a noblewoman appealed to the heartles girl. Her triumph was complete until the wedding day, when the witch appeared just as the ceremony was completed. She jeered at her victim, then transformed the "nobleman" back into a scarecrow again, so the girl was stricken down in what she had believed to be her hour of success. The story is allegorical.

THE SPOILED DARLING'S DOLL (April 4).—Her parents said she was a darling. The long suffering servants thought otherwise. From the time that she could first crawl and talk she had had her own way.

Her nurse did not like her. The little girl never obeyed, but always argued and protested. She smashed her toys, and tore her clothes, and screamed so her sick mother took a turn for the worse. Her parents, however, were satisfied she would outgrow her unpleasant habits, and sure enough she did. One evening the nurse rushed into her room, attracted by the cries of the child. She had tumbled out of bed, but strange to say was not peevish. She apologized to the nurse for causing any trouble and altogether was so sweet that the nurse was convinced the child was seriously ill. Her father questioned her and the little one told him of the remarkable conduct of her newest and biggest doll. It seems that the doll came to life, treated the little girl as she had treated her nurse, made life a misery to her and taught her that selfish people cause much unnecessary suffering. So the litle girl firmly decided to be good in the future.

What did the family do? Well, the mother wept, and said she feared her darling was too good to live. The doll really knew what had happened, but she never said a word. It is hard to get dolls to talk, although they have been known to wink when pleased.

reality she goes back to the cafe. She earns good money and instructs an art dealer to buy come of her husband's pictures. Bell immediately gets a swelled head and tells his wife there is no need of her to work any more, but she, of course, knows better, and insists on returning to work. Meantime, the uncle accidentally meets the art dealer and finds out who the purchaser was of the nephew's pictures. He goes to interview the girl and is pleased with her goodness and sacrifice. A small fire starts in the music school where Bell thinks his wife is working. He enters the school to find that his wife never worked there. Full of jealous rage, he finds her in the cafe and is about to attack her, but is prevented by his uncle and the dealer, who explain things.

A STUDY IN SOCIOLOGY (April 1).—A clause in the will of an old millionaire forbids his daughter from marrying any man but one who has become prominent through hard work. A relative of the girl introduces her to a supposed author of a book on sociology, but who, in reality, is a professional gambler. Fascinated by the suave manners of the gambler, she accepts him as a possible suitor. The gambler gives her a diamond ring which he had received from Travis in payment of a debt. In order to become the wife of a sociologist, the girl decides to do as he has done—study the workers by being one of them. She secures a position as maid in the Travis home and falls in love with the chauffeur. Young Travis, refused money by his mother, steals a gold chain. Although the maid's suitcase is searched and nothing found therein, the theft is laid on her on account of the discovery of the diamond, and she is placed under arrest. Before the officer can get into the auto carrying Mrs. Travis, her son and the maid, the chauffeur drives off to a lonely spot in the country where he proceeds to thrash the son. In the scuffle the chain falls from young Travis' pocket. While the mother is reprimanding her son, the chauffeur and the maid run off to a railway station, where he gives her money so that she may return to her home. Finding that she is haunted by the memory of the young chauffeur, the heiress locates his whereabouts through an ad in a local newspaper. He reveals his identity as being the real author of the book on sociology, and, according to the terms of the will, the girl wins the old millionaire's millions by marrying a man who has made a name for himself by hard work.

RELIANCE.

THE HALFWIT (Mar. 29).—Bud Johnson, a halfwitted youth, is in love with Ruth Bradley, the belle of the village. Ed Moore, a young farmer, proposes and is accepted. Bud hears of this and plans some way in which he can revenge himself. Ruth and Ed elope and are married. She writes home to her father, begging forgiveness. He softens and answers her letter, bidding her come home at once. When he mails it, however, it falls out of the chute and is found by the halfwitted boy, who, seeing it is addressed to Ruth, opens and reads it. He tears it into bits.

The young people, receiving no answer, conclude that the old man will not relent. Ed goes to work in the city and they soon have their own home. Repenting, Bud sets out to find them. After a search lasting two years, he finally locates them in time to save their baby's life and bring all three home to the waiting father. This much done, the poor halfwitted boy, asking forgiveness, dies.

THE JUDGE'S VINDICATION (2 reels, April 2).—Judge Harris refuses to decide a case in favor of a certain powerful trust. The head of this trust vows he will "break" the judge and immediately sets about for some way to do it.

Not long afterword, at the instigation of the trust magnate, the judge is impeached. His wife and daughter are heartbroken, but believe firmly in him. He goes to the magnate and pleads with him to no avail. His daughter, Rose, decides to see the tyrant herself. She does so but is only laughed at.

She goes to the courtroom and there meets a young reporter, who listens to her trouble. He has seen a package of letters pass from the secretary of the trust to the president, and knows they are relative to her father's case. The thing is to get these letters.

He wants a story for his paper, and also wants to help the pretty girl, so he starts off with her. They drive to the president's house. The reporter enters, revolver in hand. Seeing the letters on the table, he grabs them, keeping the president at bay with his revolver. The president's lawyer entering, tries to overpower the reporter, but in the struggle he gets away and dashes out of the house and into the waiting car. The president orders his car and follows them, but is unable to catch the smaller car. The reporter and the girl get to the Senate Chamber in time to produce the letters and change the verdict to a vote of unanimous acquittal. She hurries home to tell her father and great joy is the result. The reporter in his office, finishes a stirring article on the methods of a certain well-known trust.

KEYSTONE.

THOSE GOOD OLD DAYS (April 7).—A gorgeously costumed play, in which a merry king gets too gay with the dancing girls of the court and gets in trouble with the irate queen. The subjects have been vainly petitioning the king for improvements in his reign, without avail. The king pays too much attention to the sweetheart of a country bumpkin who shows his resentment by chasing his royal highness with a pistol and perforating the royal legs. The king takes refuge in the top of a tree, from which ignominious position he is finally rescued by his courtiers. In consideration of the bumpkin promising not to tell the queen of this latest escapade, the king grants the petition of his subjects.

A GAME OF POKER (April 10).—Schmidt practices by himself holding out a hand, a royal flush, and then visits his gambler friends. They proceed to 'trim" him, and manage to pick his pocket of the concealed hand, but in passing the cards under the table Schmidt gets the hand back again, winning all the money.

FATHER'S CHOICE (April 10).—Father wants Mabel to marry a little, wealthy shrimp. She is in love with Charlie, a big, strapping fellow. Mabel is locked up in the house, but her lover sets the house on fire, and in the confusion runs to the minister's house with her. Father and his choice pursue, but Mabel and her lover hide in the chimney. Father sticks around with a big gun, and Mabel and her lover make up as negroes and are married, father being persuaded to act as best man.

WILLY PREFERS LIBERTY TO WEALTH (April 10).—Willy, a little street singer and his faithful dog Medor, are lunching before going to work. The child takes his guitar, his old hat and with his dog, starts out for a day's work. He sings and plays before a cafe, while Medor dances. The sight pleases the spectators and the pennies fall heavily into the old hat. The pretty scene has attracted the attention of Mr. and Mrs. Deval, who are very rich and childless, and they decide to adopt him. Willy accepts, but not without certain reluctance. At his new home he is presented to all the servants, who smile at him scornfully. Willie marvels at all the luxuries around him, for all his old clothes are replaced by new ones and he cannot recognize himself. He even feels somewhat embarrassed. At the table Willy is scolded because he has no manners and they also prohibit the dog coming into the dining room. Willy cannot stand this any longer and gets into a frightful temper, but they calm him the best they can. During the night, he cannot sleep and longs for freedom and liberty. He gets up, goes to the window, opens it, and in the moonlight sees his dog waiting for him. He finds his old clothes, puts them on and leaves the place, leaving a note, "You are very good to me, but I cannot live without my liberty, Goodbye." He reaches the old garret and plays on his guitar, till he and his beloved dog fall into a sweet sleep.

THE GOLDEN HORN, TURKEY (April 10).—The Golden Horn, a gulf of the Bosphorus, separates Constantinople from Stamboul. Two bridges have been built over it, at a point where it is 1350 feet wide, and about 135 feet deep. The Golden Horn is about 8 miles long and terminates at the Valley of "Sweet Waters" from which it flows into the Rivers Ali Bey-Son, formally known as Cydons and Kiabat and Hane-Son.

ON FORTUNE'S WHEEL (2 parts—April 11).—James Mulford, a banker, facing ruin, robs the bank. Boyd, the cashier, is sent to prison for 15 years for the robbery. Mulford places his young son in a boarding school and goes to a small Arizona town and starts another bank. Boyd's wife places her infant daughter in a foundling home and goes to work by the day. Fifteen years later Mulford's son and Boyd's daughter have grown up, have met, and are engaged to be married. The girl had been adopted by a wealthy family, named Clayton, and had been raised in luxury. Her real mother has lost track of her. The mother is employed as housekeeper in the Clayton home and finally learns that the Clayton girl is her daughter.

Mulford in the west writes to forbid his son marrying a person of doubtful parentage. Mrs. Boyd, the girl's real mother, goes to Arizona to interview Mulford. Meanwhile Boyd is released from prison and is on the trail of Mulford to get revenge. He meets his wife in Mulford's bank. Mulford flees before Boyd's wrath, but is captured and killed by Indians whom he had defrauded out of valuable lands. Mulford's objections removed by death, the young people are free to marry.

SACRIFICED TO THE LIONS (April 11).—When they are turned out of their territory the Indians approach the Governor, and endeavor to persuade him to return it to them. They fail to make him alter his decision by conciliatory methods, and so resolve to resort to more forcible means of attaining their ends. They steal the Governor's only daughter, and send a messenger to him telling him that, unless he accedes to their demands, within three days his daughter will be sacrificed to the lions.

The Governor sends a messenger to the Indians agreeing to their wishes, but he encounters many perils in the desert, and finally loses his way.

Meanwhile, the three days expire, and the maid is cast into the lion's den. Just as the animal is about to devour her, the messenger, worn with the weary fight across the desert, arrives just in time to save the maid from falling beneath the lion's paws.

THE LURE OF THE LORELEI (Mar. 25).—Delilah, is a much sought woman. To one of her receptions comes Raoul Champlain, a cavalry officer. He has no objection to making a little love to her. She reciprocates. He shows her a letter from his mother which inhibits his remaining with her, and further saying that his bethrothed is impatient to see him.

Her charm is so potent that when he does go to his home to be married, he is gloomy and distraught, and at the moment of the tying of the connubial knot, he flouts the bride-elect and refuses to go on with the ceremony.

The bewitched officer returns to Paris and enters his charmer's house. Then comes the harsh note in the Lorelei's song. He finds her returning the caresses of another man. There is a duel in which Champlain is wounded.

Champlain writes to his mother asking forgiveness. He follows the letter before he could have had time to receive an answer. All is silent and still on the maternal threshhold. As he stands by the window looking out he hears solemn funeral bells tolling in the tower. A few moments later passes a black shrouded bier. By its side his mother walks weeping. The dead face on the bier was that of his fiance whose heart he had crushed.

Months pass and the mother is living with her son in Paris. The hours grow late and he has not come home. She finds a letter from Delilah, with whom Champlain had become reconciled. It reads: "Well do I see that you love me not. To refuse to buy me the jewel for which I so much long, is heartless, particularly as you control the regiment's finances. Bring it to-morrow."

The mother goes to the apartments of Delilah. There the mother begs and implores that Delilah give up her son. The adventuress laughs and tells the mother to be gone. A dagger flashes in the outraged parent's hand and she kills Delilah.

SEA ANEMONES (Mar. 25).—Anemones are found on the rocks when the tide has ebbed. To these rocks, they are warmly, also tightly, attached. At flood tide, when the water again covers them, they open.

THE AMATEUR SLEUTH (Mar. 27).—John Plum Duff receives a threatening note asking for $4.98 to be paid within a limited time. Duff is frightened, and; in reply to his advertisement for a detective, Herlock Sholmes gives his services. How Sholmes finally rounds up the would-be blackhands and places them in the custody of the police, makes who turn out to be the servants of a millionaire, a fitting climax to a scintillating comedy.

HYPNOTIZING HANNAH (Mar. 27).—Tiny Tim Buctoo is so impressed with the mesmeric magic of the hypnotist whom he saw at the circus that when he gets home he tries to hypnotize the cat, gold fish and other pets of the household. Failing in this he next tackles the cook who—well see the picture for the sequence.

GREAT NORTHERN.

A SKIPPER'S STORY (April 5).—Jack is a skipper, and with three of his seafaring friends, he is boasting of his wonderful accomplishments while seated in a tavern. Lions, tigers, sharks and whales hold no fear for him, and countless have been his adventures and triumphs. Whatever Jack's qualities as a brave man may have been, he proves to be a poor story-teller, and his pals quickly tire of his recital. They decide to test his bravery and buy from a costumer a huge shark's head, tiger's skin and a wooden leg, and with this outfit they hurry to the swimming bath, where an appointment has been made.. It is with difficulty that Jack is coaxed to enter the water, but when he finally consents, he is startled by the cry of "Shark," and looking over his shoulder, sees the dummy head in the water, the supposed fish being propelled by one of Jack's friendly jokers. He shouts in terror and faints when he arrives at the landing stage. So much for the first installment of his punishment for being a boaster. The trio of jokers next bribe a lion tamer to allow them the use of one of his cages, and when Jack is "half seas over," he is placed in a comfortable position in the empty cage. One of his pals dons the tiger skin and waits patiently until the roaring of the wild beasts in the adjoining cages awakens the boastful hero. When he finds that he is in the same cage with what appears to be a ferocious tiger, he bounds for the open gate and dashes madly for his good ship. The "tiger" follows, but Jack reaches his cabin before the animal overtakes him. He sinks exhausted upon a bunk and a few minutes later the jocular trio of old tars file in and have a good, hearty laugh at his expense.

"Never again with any of that boasting stuff," sighs Jack as his three friends sit at the side of his bunk and chide him for his cowardice.

PILOT.

IN THE BATTLE'S SMOKE (April 3).—The Warren and Niles families have a feud. Bert Warren has killed Zeke Niles' father. Niles returns to get revenge. He follows him to the field where he is plowing and secretes himself in the bushes and shoots the old man. Warren's daughter and son Bert arrive on the spot as the old man is dying and Bert promises his father to carry on the feud until the Niles family is wiped out. Niles and his sister Beth receive a letter from their uncle up north asking them to go and make their home with him. Bert Warren visits the deserted hut of the Niles and discovers to his anger that his proposed victim has flown the country. The war breaks out. Zeke Niles enlists in the Federal army and Bert Warren joins the Confederates. A battle between the opposing armies takes place and the Confederates are beaten and are forced to make their retreat, leaving many of the wounded of the north and south on the battlefield, among them being the two feudists. Zeke Niles is severely wounded and his cries for help reach Bert Warren's ears. In the moonlight they do not recognize each other and Warren makes his way to a small stream in order to get water for the wounded soldier. He returns with a canteen and is about to give his enemy a drink when a shell bursts near them. The light from the exploding shell illuminated the faces of the two men. They recognize each other and Bert Warren is about to kill the man who shot his father. Niles begs for mercy. The shell has set fire to the undergrowth and in a few moments the flames surround them. Bert Warren tells Zeke that he will not kill him, but will leave him to be burned alive. As he leaves the scene of the fire a vision of his sister appears telling him that two wrongs never make a right, and to let the feud end there. He quickly makes up his mind and rushing back to the place where he left his old enemy to perish in the flames, he takes him upon his back and carries him to safety.

RYNO.

THE OUTCAST (April 7).—Myrtle Henderson is in love with Harry Marsden, but her father, knowing that the boy is something of a ne'er-do-well, forbids the match and orders Harry from the house. The young people meet clandestinely and go for a walk over the hills. Myrtle accidentally stumbles on the root of a tree, and falls over a cliff. Harry runs to her aid, but finds her unconscious, and thinking her dead, runs away. The father, who has followed them, discovers Myrtle and carries her home, where she revives.

In the meantime Harry has gone to the city to find employment, and sometime later Myrtle also secures work in the city. One evening she misses her train home, not arriving until late. Her father, in a rage, accuses her of meeting Harry against his wishes, and turns her from home. Harry has lost his position and contemplates suicide. Myrtle, in despair, intends to do the same thing. By chance of fate they both come to the same dock to jump into the water. She sees him preparing to jump, and rushes to his aid, but is too late. Just as she places her hand on his shoulder he jumps. Two police officers see her, and think she has pushed him overboard. She is arrested and accused of his murder. Harry has not drowned and discovers later that she is accused of his murder. He comes forward with the information that he is the man who jumped into the water, and she is released. Her father, seeing their devotion, accepts Harry as his son-in-law.

OFF THE MAINLAND (April 11).—An old tramp, begging from door to door, is refused by one woman and given an old loaf of bread by another. He retires to his hut on an island to eat and rest. In the meantime the children of the two women go for a walk along the seashore with their pets, a cat and a dog. They are cut off by the rising tide and wander around disconsolate. The tramp, hearing their cries, goes out to see what is the matter. He brings them back to his hut, feeds them on the loaf given him by one of the mothers. They sleep on his cot while he goes out to get wood. Meanwhile, the children are missed by their parents, and calling the sheriff, they organize a search party. The first clue is the dog, that swims across the tideway. The cat is next found on the island near the hut. The fathers of the children take them home, while the sheriff and his assistant search the woods for the tramp. He is captured, recognized by the women and incarcerated. The children later tell of his kindness, which brings about his release. The happy men, who have recovered their babies, give him work with themselves at the forge.

SOLAX.

THE LADY DOCTOR (April 9).—Claire, studying for a lady doctor, does not care for men, particularly four students, chums, who are greatly attracted by her. Three of these chums, tired of being continually snubbed by her, resolve upon a scheme which will not only bring themselves under her notice, but cause her, through doctor's instincts, to care for them. At various times when Claire is near, one pretends to sprain his wrist, another cuts himself badly, and a third has fainting fits. Claire doctors the three chums, much to their enjoyment. Meanwhile, Dan, the fourth chum, will not impose upon Claire's kindness in this faudulent manner. A girl friend discovers that the chums are merely shamming, and tells Claire of it; the two plan revenge. The chums, coming along a country road, find Claire in a ditch, with her bicycle on top of her. She says she has broken her ankle; so the four reverently carry her home on a hurdle. As soon as she reaches her door, she leaps from the hurdle and runs away laughing. To their disgust they see other people, too, are capable of a little maligning. So when the chums again come across Miss Claire lying dusty and limp in the middle of the road, they laugh and walk on, excepting Dan, who discovers she has met with a real accident and is badly hurt. He lifts her up and carries her to her home. When the other fellows see Dan walking arm-in-arm with the bandaged young lady doctor, both palpably in love with each other, they growl.

HIS SON-IN-LAW (April 11).—John Cameron, a wealthy widower, sends his daughter, Edna, away to college. The young lady meets Hugh Macy, and falls in love with him. He begs her to be married immediately and she finally consents. Edna starts to write the news to her father when Hugh gets a call to the city. They decide that Hugh shall call on his father. Edna sends a letter to her father, telling him that she is married and that her husband will call upon him the next day. When Cameron received this he was furiously angry, and writes a red hot letter in reply, saying that he had no desire to see her husband and will not even allow her to return home until she has disposed of him. He places the letter in his pocket and starts out to mail it, when a clerk enters with a special letter from a salesman representing the firm of which Cameron is the head, saying that one of the firm's best customers is coming to town. The letter states that the customer, being afraid to carry a large amount of money, would like to secure a thousand dollars from the firm and have it charged to his account. Cameron resumes his seat at his desk forgetting the letter that he started to mail.

The next day Edna and Hugh, receiving no reply from her father, take it for granted that silence means consent and Hugh leaves for the city. He calls at Cameron's office and the latter mistakes him for the out-of-town customer. Nothing is too good for him and Cameron personally takes charge of him, wines him, dines him, and finally gives him the thousand dollars. Hugh mistakes this for a wedding present, and wires Edna to hurry home that everything is O.K. She arrives at the home just as her father is drinking a toast to the supposed customer. He is surprised to see her, but is thunderstruck when she throws herself in the stranger's arms. The maid enters with a telegram saying that the customer was delayed and will not arrive until later.

Cameron realizes that the joke is on him, when he finds the letter to Edna still in his pocket. But Hugh has proven that he is a good fellow and Cameron tears up the letter and welcomes them home.

The West Point Cadets,—the pets of every Inaugural, march past. The U. S. Marine Band, with red-lined capes thrown back and brass instruments glistening in the sun; the Annapolis Midshipmen, in marching regalia, and the U. S. Regulars.

BEAUTIFUL BUTTERFLIES.—Kinemacolor again demonstrates its ability to "hold the mirror up to Nature," reproducing in every shade and changing phase the gorgeous yet delicate coloring of the butterfly's wings. Rare specimens from tropic climes are revolved before the camera, and afterwards small sections of their wings are highly magnified, showing the arrangement of the iridescent flakes of color—so delicate that a rude breath will blow them away. Some of these insects have the imitative faculty, for instance, the Kalloma Imachus, whose wings look exactly like dead leaves when viewed from above, although they are beautifully colored on the under side.

NATIVE CARNIVAL PROCESSION, CEYLON.—This curious and interesting scene was witnessed on the occasion of the election of a Cingalese leader to an important position in local affairs. Apparently the whole village has turned out in honor of the occasion, for the street is crowded with people bearing garlands and flags, and the procession takes some time to pass. In the rear are several fine elephants.

THE ROYAL VISIT TO IRELAND.—A visit to Ireland early in July was included in Their Majesties' Coronation Tour of the British Isles. The Royal Party included Her Majesty the Queen, the Prince of Wales and Princess Mary. The principal events during the tour were the reception at Kingstown and the Royal visits to Maynooth College and Leopardstown Races. We see in the order named: 1. Their Majesties' Arrival at Kingston Harbor. 2. The Royal Pinnace. An excellent view of the Royal Party is obtained as the boat passes. 3. Street Scenes of Kingstown in holiday mood. 4. The Royal Carriage, preceded by a company of Dragoons. 5. The Journey to Dublin; reception at Blackrock. 6. Bouquets are presented to the Queen and Princess Mary. 7. Visit to Maynooth College. 8. Leopardstown races. 9. Arrival of the King and Queen. 10. A view of the races.

A MERRY MONARCH (2 reels).—The King finds Simple, a drunken peasant by the wayside, takes him to the castle, and dresses him in royal robes. The fool is disguised as a woman and passed off as the Queen. The King is treated as a lackey, and until weary of the jest the court have a merry time.

At home Mrs. Simple, a shrew, waits for her husband, then goes to the village inn and learns that the King has taken Simple to the castle. She rushes there, overthrows the guards and enters the throne room in time to see the fool seated on her husband's knee. She causes much trouble and is finally pushed outside the castle gates.

The King wearies of his jest and Simple in his old clothes, his pockets full of gold, is taken to the roadside where the King found him. When he awakens from his drunken slumbers and sees his old clothes, he thinks it all a dream, but the gold in his pockets reassures him and he goes to the Inn. There he assumes kingly airs much to the amusement of the loiterers who humor him but his dream of glory is soon over. Mrs. Simple comes to the Inn and leads her royal husband off by the ear.

At home poor Simple is forced to build the fire, and in the rising smoke he sees a vision of his few hours of kingly greatness.

FISHERMAN'S DAUGHTER.—The beautiful daughter of an old fisherman is deeply in love with a stunning revenue officer on parole near the old fishing hut. The honest old seaman doubts the sincerity of the handsome suitor and plans a test of truth and loyalty from the man in uniform. Cupid successfully pilots the happy lovers over the stormy waves of the old fisherman's anger and safely lands them on the island of happiness.

TOBOGGANING IN SWITZERLAND.—In the opening scenes those taking part in the sport are journeyed by funicular railway as far as that curious means will take them; the rest of the journey is made on foot. One of the first parties to make the descent has labelled itself "Rag-Time," a concession to the mountain craze. The toboggans dash past the camera at high speed, being kept to the track by the banks of snow which line the course.

THE SUBSTITUTE.—The younger son of a great English house is down and out in America, and tosses a coin to see if he shall steal or commit suicide. The coin falls at the feet of a young girl, who proves to be his salvation. They are engaged to be married when an illness leaves the girl blind. The man learns that he has unexpectedly become head of one of the greatest houses in England. The family lawyer shows him the impossibility of taking this girl to England as his wife, and deludes her into a marriage with a tramp, as substitute for the now great Lord.

When the tramp sees his happy, helpless wife seated by their fire, the man in him awakens, and he is ashamed—but it is too late. The Lord pines for his humble sweetheart, and goes to Africa to hunt big game. There in the wilderness he dies, leaving all his unentailed wealth to his lost love.

The wife suddenly finds that she can detect light. An operation is performed, and the wife insists that the face of her husband is the first she will look upon. The doctor removes the bandages; surprise is followed by horror as the woman shrinks, terrified. Explanations are of no avail, and the heart-broken husband wanders forth again.

When the wife has come to a realization of his love and tenderness, a personal is inserted in the papers. A poor, shivering newsboy gives the tramp a paper, which is used to kindle a fire. As the tramp sits looking into the fire, a piece of the paper catches his eye. He starts, snatches it from the flames and reads there the wife's desire for his return. Love and shame fight a battle; love wins—and a happy ending rounds out a great story.

THE STORY OF THE ORANGE.—Beginning with a panorama of an orange grove, we pass on to the setting out of the nursery stock through the various stages of the development of this luscious fruit. Scenes showing the budding of Navel orange slips on to seedling stock, the wrapping of seedling plants to protect them from rabbits, etc., are very interesting. Then in succession are shown a cultivator in a grape fruit grove, fertilizing the soil of a grove, and views of a twenty-year-old Naval Grove.

Close views of fruit and blossoms on the same branch, the picking of fruit from four-year-old Valencias and interesting scenes showing how the fruit is sorted, graded, wrapped and packed.

The concluding scenes show some fine specimens of the fruit, with views of the packing house and the dispatching in refrigerator cars of the shipments for the East.

A Denial:

In a recent advertisement signed "Independent Exchange Co., P. A. Powers, General Manager," the statement was made that the Interstate Films Co. is a member of the so-called "Independent Exchange Co." The undersigned company, owner of large exchanges handling the Universal program, announces that such statement was made without any authority whatsoever and is entirely untrue.

The Truth:

The truth of the matter is that the undersigned company, far from being a member of any group of exchanges hostile to the Universal Film Manufacturing Co., is working in perfect harmony with the Universal, believing that the Universal is not only the best and fairest film manufacturing company in the business, but that it is producing the strongest program in the world. By a unanimous vote of the fourteen members of its Board of Directors, the undersigned company resolved that the claim of the so-called "Independent Exchange Co." be publicly branded as untrue.

Exhibitors:

Those of you who want the Universal program and who realize that reel for reel it is the strongest and best in the land will find the following exchanges (owned by The Interstate Films Co.) ready to give you prompt, satisfactory and clean-cut service at any and all times:

Mr. Exhibitor

YOU have no doubt noted the fact that we have not advertised our Musical Electric Bells since last fall, the reason for which is the fact that our factory has been oversold on Musical Electric Bells; and what is the use of advertising when you cannot fill the orders on hand?

We are glad to state that owing to our having appropriated more space for our electrically operated instrument department, we have been able to catch up with the demand for our goods, and as our experimenting department has recently produced a number of new electrically operated instruments, in which every exhibitor will be interested.

We take great pleasure in announcing the issue of our catalogue "F" in which we will list in addition to Musical Electric Bells, the following absolutely new electrically operated Musical Instruments, our "Class A" Musical Electric Bells, our new style Swiss Electric Bells, our Electric Octaphone, Electric Uniphone, Electric Cathedral Chimes, Electric Orchestra Bells, Electric Parsifal Bells, Electric Steel Marimbaphones, Electric Xylophones.

Do not fail to send for a copy of our catalogue "F" which is now on the press, and will contain a world of information regarding electrically operated musical instruments.

Mr. Exhibitor: we do not tie you down to a mere half dozen instruments to be operated from a single keyboard in connection with your piano, but any or all of the 240 different electrically operated instruments as listed in our catalogue "F" can be played either individually, collectively, or in any combination, in connection with your piano, by your piano player.

Write for a catalogue now, free for the asking.

J. C. Deagan

The above set of Bells range twenty-five notes, two octaves chromatic from C to C, are mounted on floor rack ready to play, and are connected to the keyboard from which they are operated, by a twenty-five foot flexible cable.

These Bells can be played as single stroke or vibrating, or soft or loud, at the will of the operator, by merely pressing buttons conveniently located on the keyboard.

We can also supply Bells of the same type as above unmounted, to be mounted about in various parts of the theatre, if you prefer them that way.

DEAGAN ELECTRIC CATHEDRAL CHIMES.

Deagan Electric Cathedral Chimes are the finest Cathedral Chimes made of pure bell metal, and universally conceded to be the best imitation of church chimes ever produced. The electric action acts as a support for the tubes and the unit action and Chimes can be mounted about in any part of the theatre same as the Deagan Musical Electric Bells.

The Chimes can be had in three different sizes of tubes, tubes for ordinary use, tubes for heavy use, and tubes for out-of-door use, and same can be had in any desired range and scale up to sets of thirty-two notes.

Deagan Electric Cathedral Chimes are completely described in our new catalogue "F," which is free for the asking. Send for a copy today.

3 California-Made Pictures Each Week

SOUNDS a bit old and hackneyed, perhaps. But don't forget its significance as applied to motion-pictures. California-made negatives are unlike the other kind—perfect, sunny days mean clear, stereoscopic photography—backgrounds of rarest beauty unobtainable elsewhere.

"California-Made" as Applied to Pictures Is Like a Government Stamp on a Bonded Whiskey---

"SUSPENDED SENTENCE"

Released Monday April 14, 1913

The youthful sheriff captures the wrong man, but the older judge has a "hunch"—and follows it up with astonishing results to all concerned. A Bully Western with plenty of snap and go. You will like it.

"IN ANOTHER'S NEST"

Released Thursday, April 17, 1913

"THE WAYS OF FATE"

Released Saturday, April 19, 1913

The child grows into manhood determining to revenge the murder of his father. A life's devotion to the cause of vengeance is thwarted by Cupid. How—makes a delightful story, half-social—half-Western.

TO THEATERS—Splendid Lithos of Jack Kerrigan, Pauline Bush and Jack Richardson now ready. Ask your exchange. You need them. No better "pullers" for your theater-entrance.

TO EXCHANGES—A Publicity Department, Complete to the last detail, awaits your service. Send us the names of daily papers in your city devoting space to motion-pictures and we will supply them with a weekly letter of live news, cuts, etc. This is for your benefit. Take advantage of it.

DICK WHITTINGTON AND HIS CAT

Three Reels

A safe and conservative proposition for all legitimate showmen and State right buyers

THIS adaptation emphasizes all that is poetic, dainty and picturesque in the old English legend. The elaborate settings and spectacular scenes are authoritative in every detail. The charm of Dick's dreamy and mystic character permeates the production and holds the interest while the spectacular and sensational climax of the burning boat and struggling crew adds an element of genuine thrill. The dignity of the performance, combined with its original and artistic light effects, characterizes the work as one of the big achievements of the year. "Children" plays are holding the attention of playgoers in New York, and crowding the Broadway theaters. Plays after this nature seem to be the tendency today. So Dick Whittington, besides being effective and attractive as a feature production, has the additional advantage of being "timely."

CRITICS SAY:

Moving Picture World—
Elaborate, expensive, thrilling and spectacular. Authentic and noteworthy.

Billboard—
The production makes an ideal one for exhibition before children, and will prove a winner for matinee performances and in schools and churches, besides being a big drawing card in large theatres.

New York Evening Sun—
And as we looked at the massive English masonry used in many of the "sets," the old English kitchen complete in every detail, the costumes of the actors and actresses, the wonderful light effects that had much to do with the "life" of the picture and the entire excellence of the photography we realized that here was the work of an artist.

WE BEG TO PRESENT

in Motion Picture form to the trade and to the American public, that great human drama of the lowly and downtrodden, from the pen of the immortal genius, VICTOR HUGO. He who by his inspired perception of man's inhumanity to man, and by the vigor of his written word, accomplished the emancipation of the weak and oppressed. The humanizing effect of the great French author will be felt as long as books are read. His works have been translated into every living tongue, and are now considered the common heritage of the world at large. The greatest of these is

Les

VICTOR HUGO

Victor Hugo, the great Colossus of French fiction, was born in a little town near Spain in 1802. At 14 he received honorable mention in a literary contest at Paris. At 17 he was editor of a literary publication. This failed and he was reduced to poverty. In his days of poverty he lived among the poor and oppressed of Paris. The knowledge he gained of down-trodden humanity was the foundation of his greatest work, "Les Miserables," written many years afterward. Hugo took to writing plays, two of which are still played: "Ruy Blas," and "Hernani." His plays had a keen satiric power combined with a melodramatic force. An element of the grotesque pervaded his work, in which there was usually to be found one or more hideous or diabolical characters. On account of his Royalistic sympathies his plays were not popular and a number of them failed. After 16 years of this he gave up writing and entered politics. As a politician he was a failure and was driven into exile and lived in England and Belgium for 19 years. In exile "Les Miserables" was written, a dramatic novel of protest against the pernicious activities of the police in persecuting petty offenders. In 1862 it appeared on the same day in ten languages. In 1871 Hugo returned to Paris. Died 1885.

THE FILM OF THE CENTURY

Never in the history of Kinematography has there been attempted a production of any of the literary classics on a scale so stupendous. The adequateness and completeness of this picture is such that the largest and best theatres may feature it on a par with the greatest theatrical stars at regular first-class theatre prices.

One that is bound to repeat in America its great success abroad. In keeping with the high class of this offering we have ordered one of the finest lines of special lithographs that ever accompanied any motion picture production. From 24 sheet stands, down.

GENERAL FILM SERVICE

Scene from "In the Days of the War"

Scene from "A Wise Old Elephant"

Four Surpassingly Good Features

EVERY week four multiple-reel features are released in General Film Service, at no extra charge to exhibitors. For the week of April 12th to 18th inclusive, the offerings are particularly choice, in keeping with the policy of the General Film Company to make each new quartet show an improvement over the last four. You ought to have these.

For Saturday, April 12th

"In the Days of the War"

PATHEPLAY. TWO REELS

Great war picture. Stirring action throughout. The blowing up of a bridge on which two regiments are fighting is a scene you'll never forget.

For Wednesday, April 16th

"A Fugitive at Bay"

CINES-KLEINE. TWO REELS

An unusual love story. A young peasant woos the Baron's daughter but must give his life in the end to save her. Beautiful scenery.

For Monday, April 14th

"A Wise Old Elephant"

SELIG. TWO REELS

Another of those fine "animal films." The elephant in this one displays almost human intelligence and succeeds in re-uniting a father and his married daughter.

For Friday, April 18th

"The Power of the Cross"

LUBIN. TWO REELS

Dramatically, one of the best films of the year. The cross, a gift from his mother, sustains a young clergyman in an hour of great distress and points the way to happiness.

EXTRA! EXTRA!

TORNADO AND FLOOD SPECIALS

WITH characteristic enterprise, General Film Service offers the first authentic motion pictures of the recent disasters in Ohio, Indiana and Nebraska. The expense of making these films, and the dangers to which the camera operators were exposed in their almost frantic efforts to be "the first in and the first out" are not material—the important thing is that the films were secured, and such films the world has never before seen.

One reel gives an adequate idea of the destruction which followed in the wake of the 200 mile-an-hour tornado that swept through the business center of Omaha. Hundreds of homeless people and property losses amounting to $7,000,000 are shown.

Three reels are devoted to the Ohio and Indiana floods—one reel by Essanay, one by Lubin and the third by Selig. Thrilling scenes of rescues in the swirling waters of the floods, panorama and bird's-eye views—yes, bird's-eye views made from an aeroplane piloted by Aviator Early with Essanay's "sky photographer" as a passenger—destruction here and devastation there, all as vividly described in the newspapers, are incidents in the three most remarkable films ever made of actual disasters that assume the proportions of national calamities.

Omaha, Nebraska, Tornado---Essanay---About 1000 Ft.
Ohio Floods---Essanay---About 1000 Ft.
Dayton, Ohio, Flood Disaster---Lubin---About 700 Ft.
Ohio and Indiana Floods---Selig---About 1000 Ft.

Facts and Comments

ON behalf of our readers, most of whom are exhibitors of motion pictures and quite busy men, and on behalf of The Moving Picture World, which can give of its space but sparingly, an earnest appeal is made to our distinguished friends the press agents to be brief in all things, and to deliver "a round, unvarnished tale." Put the accent on the word "unvarnished." Let the readers have the facts, and leave the varnish in your literary pails and buckets. The teeth in our word-cutting machine have been sharpened, and are ready for work. It is a natural thing for a press agent to be enthusiastic, but he is apt to be one-sided, and wholly oblivious of the fact that he must divide the advantages of publicity with many others. Old, threadbare plots and "comic" business that has outlived its usefulness ten times over are described in a strain of enthusiasm and with a mass of stilted words which moves the cutting teeth of the machine to their highest speed.

So much of this matter which is intended for the benefit of the exhibitor is written in constant defiance of good style and good sense. Every dog is a "canine"; every cat is a "feline"; every rat is a "rodent," and every horse is an "equine." Words with three or more syllables are preferred and the plain short, Saxon words, the very sinew and muscle of our tongue, are avoided as if the use of them would disgrace a well regulated press agent. What purpose does all this serve? This is a very busy age and people have little time to waste upon words. In a mass of long and dreary stories the eye quickly turns to the shorter item. The shorter the story, the greater the chance of its being read. The process of boiling down should begin at home.

THE legislature of Pennsylvania is considering a piece of legislation which in part rivals the freak measures of Kansas and Iowa. A drastic measure of censorship is proposed which should receive the immediate attention of the organized exhibitors of that State. The censors are to be appointed by the Board of Education of the several municipalities. Pennsylvania is one of the largest states in the Union, and there must be at least thirty or forty Boards of Education. The enactment and enforcement of such a provision would practically put an end to the business of exhibiting motion pictures in the Keystone State. There is but one clause in the proposed bill which seems rational. The utmost freedom is given to "representations of biblical or historical scenes and incidents of dramatic art." This is in pleasant contrast to the English idea of censorship which would absolutely prohibit such representation. Whoever inserted this sensible paragraph into the Pennsylvania bill has a fairly clear notion of the rights of classic literature and of art.

THE Moving Picture World has been commended by exhibitors in various parts of the country for its decided stand against films which contain advertisements. There cannot be any two opinions on this subject. If the exhibitor desires to make use of his screen for advertising purposes, that is his affair; but he cannot be asked to advertise an article of commerce and pay for the privilege of doing so. From the tone and tenor of our correspondence on this subject it would appear, however, that the great majority of exhibitors are against advertising of any kind on the screen. Just as a farmer takes pride in his barn and likes to keep its outside looking clean, and free from the brush of the sign painter, so the exhibitor does not want to give his screen up to advertising. Unfavorable inferences as to the financial condition and management are often drawn from too much advertising on the screen. The public have no means of showing their resentment at being compelled to look an advertisement in the face, but the resentment is there, just the same, and where there is competition between two or three exhibitors the wise and progressive exhibitor will scrupulously avoid anything that can possibly give any offense to his patrons.

WE observe with pleasure that exhibitors know how to invoke the law against persistent misrepresentation. In a western state a minister of the Gospel persisted for many months in denouncing a moving picture entertainment conducted by an exhibitor and his wife. As it was the only moving picture in the city the slanderous references of the minister could only mean the owners of that particular house. The minister attacked the exhibitor and his wife from the pulpit and also personally in his conversations with members of his church and other residents of the city. The clergyman, who has now been made a defendant in an action for slander, in which large damages are claimed, was in the habit of stating publicly, that "picture shows were immoral" and "that people operating them were also immoral." It appears that before seeking redress in the Courts this exhibitor repeatedly called upon the minister and urged him to attend his entertainment. The minister refused to listen and scouted the idea of his looking at a moving picture. He nevertheless continued his tirades of indiscriminate abuse, and after half a year or so patience ceased to be a virtue. Papers were served upon the reckless rector, and he has been quiet ever since. This looks to us like a good case for punitive damages. Where a man speaks from lack of information there may be some excuse for him, but when he continues uttering false statements after every opportunity has been afforded to him to learn the actual facts he is no longer entitled to any consideration. We earnestly hope the jury will take this view of the case. We recommend the action of this exhibitor to others who may suffer through the unwarranted assaults of men who abuse the sacred character of their calling and have no sense of their responsibility.

Danger Ahead.

By W. Stephen Bush

THE Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children has just issued a statement to the newspapers of the State of New York, soliciting the co-operation of the press in a campaign against the motion picture theaters in the city and state. The Society has drafted a bill, which would, if enacted into law, drive every moving picture theater out of business over night. The bill was introduced in the Assembly but a short time ago and despite the protests of counsel of the organized exhibitors it was reported favorably out of the Cities Committee and advanced to third reading. This means that it may be called up for final passage without notice and pass the Assembly. There is plenty of time in the legislative year to have the bill go to the Senate and once it passes the upper house nothing less than a veto of the governor will prevent its becoming a law. We do not say that this probable, but it is quite possible.

The Society is no longer the unpopular tyrannical organization fathered by the eccentric and fanatical Gerry. The head of it is former Assistant District Attorney John D. Lindsay, a cool-headed conservative lawyer, who has long enjoyed the esteem and confidence of the community. His rational and enlightened methods have characterized the policy of the Society ever since he has been at the head of it. He has enlisted in this campaign the aid of powerful influences and the exhibitors will do well to treat his efforts seriously and meet them with all the force at their command.

The statement sent out by the Society gives facts and figures well sustained by documentary evidence. The claim is made, in all sincerity we doubt not, "that degenerates have found moving picture resorts the easiest means of making the acquaintance of children and numerous unspeakable vile crimes against both boys and girls have resulted." The Moving Picture World has been at pains to examine and verify the facts, upon which this shocking assertion has been predicated. We are compelled to dissent from the statistician of the Society when he claims that a large number of certain abhorrent crimes against children originated from evil associations formed in motion picture theaters. In a considerable number of cases looked into it would appear to a fair-minded person that the alleged connection between the motion picture theater and the commission of the crime in question is somewhat fanciful and unsupported by the facts in the case. Several cases are cited where a man took a girl under the age of consent to a motion picture theater and afterward wronged her. It is absurd to impute such a crime to the motion picture theater. Nor will the indictment against the motion picture theater as a resort for evil associations hold water, where the offender bought tickets for his victims or waited for them outside the theater. Making the proper allowances and reductions from the somewhat colored reports of the Society there remains enough of terrible truth to shock and alarm the friends of the picture and the friends of the children alike. Enough is shown to put the exhibitor on his guard and to make him scrupulous in observing the law regulating the admission of unaccompanied minors.

The very men who are back of this report and the high officials of the Society freely admit that the exhibitors as a body are "a mighty fine lot of men." Not long ago the Mayor provided the Society with an extra squad of men to investigate motion picture theaters and the report of these men was on the whole entirely favorable to the personnel of the exhibitor. I have carefully read the records of a number of convictions, in which the most shocking testimony was given. Beasts in the shape and semblance of men had debauched children of tender age. If these little children had been refused admission, as the law demands, a good many of these sickening crimes would never have been committed. Of course, we know that the vast majority of moving picture exhibitors realize their responsibilities and are as honorable and as conscientious as any set of men in any walk of life. This is not guesswork but knowledge based on facts within my own personal observations. It is their duty and the duty of the organized exhibitors to drive these black sheep out of business. As a rule they are foreigners who have but recently come to this country and who are utterly insensible to any moral reproach or appeal. They understand neither the law nor the language of the country and have not the slightest conception of their responsibilities. It is greatly to be deplored that these men have it in their power to discredit the reputable majority, but there can be no doubt about the fact. The influence of the organized exhibitors ought to be exerted against such men.

Right here we are compelled to add that all exhibitors ought to exercise the utmost care in the selection of their employees from the manager to the youngest usher. A careful perusal of the court records shows that nearly twenty per cent. of the crimes, debited against the motion picture, originated with men who were employed in small jobs about the theaters. Some of the most disgusting recitals deal with such temporary employees in the role of the chief offenders. It is not enough to be careful in the selection of the employees, it is just as necessary to watch their conduct. Here is a responsibility which no exhibitor can afford to delegate or to evade. He must be on the alert constantly. Ordinary vigilance will enable him to prevent a good deal of scandal and crime. The best way is after all a rigid observance of the law regulating the admission of minors. Here lies the root of the evil.

We consider the proposed bill advocated by the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children altogether too drastic and radical. To put the motion picture house under the law regulating the theaters in first-class cities would defeat some of the greatest benefits of the motion picture. The kinematograph is the people's theater and the poor man's amusement. We must never lose sight of the educational value of the pictures. They spread knowledge and instructions just as the channels and viaducts distribute water. In many cases they supplement and supplant the school, the church and the library. A few larger theaters would, of course, be supervised and controlled much more easily than a good many small ones, but the small theater has an equal right of existence, for it brings the wonders of the kinematograph to the door of even the humblest home, where it is needed most.

Directorial Censorship

By Louis Reeves Harrison

THE Dear Public is willing to pay often and well for what is good in motion-picture production, and every exhibitor in the land is on the lookout for releases entertaining and instructive to suit a variety of tastes. The proposition before those who create and exercise selective taste in advance is not frightfully complicated, but there are many difficulties in the way not apparent to those who enjoy superior moving pictures, and not the least of these is a chronic disability on the part of directors to exercise the delicate art of discovering excellence.

I have tried to say this gently. I have no desire to break the pleasant personal relations I enjoy with dozens of earnest and capable directors. Most of them realize that I am just as earnest as they are, but I am continually pointing out where their pictures may be bettered for the interest of all concerned, and this duty is not one a man fond of popularity would enter upon as a steady thing.

I listened carefully one evening while an intelligent director spoke at the photoplaywrights' dinner, while he advised scenarios writers to keep in mind that they must suit the ideas of directors if they wished to see their creations produced. He supported his view ably, and I have no reason to doubt that other directors would have given cordial approval to all that he said. He argued convincingly that the director was the one who materialized the author's ideals and so published his message that it might be clearly and comprehensively read by millions.

That sounds good at first, but a weakness in his statement is at once revealed if he was addressing himself figuratively to the great mass of amateurs and semi-professional writers who occasionally make enough from a year's output, after paying all expenses, to cover one month's laundry bill. I should like to be informed how gentlemen and ladies of artistic longings and histrionic-scenic-screenic aspirations are to know exactly what a hundred or more directors of diverse tastes want? I have yet to meet a director who attempted to say what the others required—how, then, can one million wandering scribes know?

It sounded good at first, but no sincere professional author ever wrote a novel with a view to suiting the publisher. If the speaker was not addressing amateurs, if he was talking straight to those who make a living by the stories they write for the press, the stage and the screen, he will change his mind in the course of time—if a course of study accompanies it. Professional writers are usually observant of what other men are doing in their departments. They can not hope for even mediocre success without a vast amount of study, worldly experience and careful observation, to say nothing of clear judgment and selective taste.

This fact has become so well recognized in the publishing business that works are accepted, published and sold on the author's name alone, and his established reputation counts heavily in his favor when his script is submitted. In no case yet reported has the author accomplished anything by writing to suit the publisher. Those who have made authorship pay have given earnestly and capably to the world what was best from within themselves irrespective of those who transferred their thoughts to readers. The director who advised scenario writers to suit directorial tastes made a mistake.

Our sore need is some selective system better than that of pleasing directors. Evidence is hung before our eyes every day that they are unable to distinguish good from bad, "the noble from the ignoble, the ephemeral from the enduring." Any writer who has sold over a hundred scenarios knows that his best scripts get the worst treatment. This forces the professional author to submit the commonplace instead of his finest efforts. A possible solution is that of a large producing firm, a house that employes fifteen directors. One of the partners acts as ART DIRECTOR and passes final judgment upon all scenarios submitted. Grand result is some of the finest photodramas thrown on the screen.

The average director has enough hard work to do without attempting to examine hundreds of scripts submitted. The preponderance of poor ones will stir a latent antagonism until it becomes a habit, and he can only exercise mediaeval justice, consider every play bad until it is clearly proven to be good, whereas he looks to the critics of his own product for that sympathetic agreement which may be entirely consistent with fair judgment. He is not apt to imitate the charitable optimism which illumines my critical work because of his intense desire for participation in photodramatic fame, if he does not want it all.

"John Smith, Author-Director" may tickle the tip ends of his credulous vanity in the studio-exhibition-room presentations and incidentally serve in place of a salary advance, but the most valuable director in any producing concern is the one of sufficient imagination to grasp an author's full purpose, who is not occupied with sordid hunt for scenario money and thereby blinded to the merits of photoplays not written by himself or his personal friends. The director who senses the beauty and variety of what regular writers create is on his way to top-notch performance.

That beauty, variety and charm is what the public wants; it is what the exhibitor is crying for; it is what will increase the dividends of the producer; it calls for discernment and artistic appreciation rather than creative ability in the director, though much that he does rises to the dignity of invention. The author may surpass the director, or the director may be above the author in his treatment of a subject, but that does not matter particularly so long as the desired result is obtained.

A censorious spirit on the part of a director is not only an injury to the firm employing him, but the purpose of his fault-finding grudge may be readily discovered by his laudation of a friendly author. It would appear in such cases that a standard is needed. In illustration rather than in suggestion let it be asked what there is in a photodrama worth production? "What of it?" is a blunt question to ask at the end of a scenario, but it may call attention to the fact that there has been much ado about nothing. Is the story enthralling? Does it hold attention to the end? Is tension created and suspense well maintained?

Is there a message, obvious or subtle, conveyed by the story in action. Does it leave a feeling of satisfaction? If of dissatisfaction, is this of the nobler and tonic sort which stimulates higher ideas? The subtle message is finest, but can it be so conveyed as to be impressed with power? Quite as much as the author, the director must consider the sensibilities of the public conscience, and it is to be hoped that he will eventually come to consider the sensibility of his own and give us finer examples of the photoplay.

"A Southern Cinderella"

Multiple Broncho Release.

Reviewed by Louis Reeves Harrison.

A DELIGHTFUL modern version of the noted fairy tale, as sweet and fascinating as its little heroine appears to be on the screen. The producers are to be congratulated upon their admirable selection of types—every role in the play is adequately filled, even to the two old coon servants who supply the comedy element. Their antics are characteristic without eccentricity. They are so diverting at times as to distract attention from the main action, and this without situations arbitrarily devised to show what they can do. A cast so admirably balanced endows the inner life of the characters with gleams of deep sympathetic charm.

Photodrama from these producers is creeping closer and closer to contemporaneous life and is increasing the dignity of the art. I hope they will keep on progressing, using American material truthfully observed, visualizing and exalting types familiar, telling us stories associated with our history as a nation until they can relate with Clyde Fitch delicacy what is now going on, what will be interesting history for our children's children. They may do more. Fitch merely commented on the pageant of social lift. I am hoping for photoplays of to-day which deal with large personages and profound passions. They are bound to come in the course of time.

Scene from "A Southern Cinderella" (Broncho).

I do not mean that the men who are making these photoplays should emulate Clyde Fitch, because he dealt with trivial people and was too much a man of the theater, but to imitate him in dealing with what concerns us to-day, then surpass him in finer exposition of what is noble, interesting or entertaining in national character. They seem to be drifting the right way, and I offer this suggestive criticism to encourage those who seem to stick persistently to the right track, the high road to success.

Returning to petite Cinderella—she has no glass slipper in this case, and her fairy godmother is an enormous nigger mammy—she is the daughter of a Southern colonel befo de wah, who has just wed a Yankee widow with a daughter very much in the matrimonial market. The two Northern ladies turn up their noses at the Southern Cinderella, especially after war is declared and the colonel leaves at the head of a cavalry regiment. Battle scenes indicate the advance of the bluecoats and Prince Charming, a Northern lieutenant, is one of a group of officers who are made comfortable in the old home by the Confederate colonel's Yankee wife.

Cinderella has to give up her room to them and is quartered with "Mammy" in one of the plantation shanties. The Yankee ladies make the most of their social opportunities, and Cinderella, in an extremely ingenious window scene, sees the handsome lieutenant courting her stepsister. Natural selection finds a way. Prince Charming encounters Cinderella at the well, and some pretty love scenes amid beautiful natural settings follow. Soldiers have no time to waste; a clash with the enemy is ever imminent; the lieutenant urges his suit so manfully that Cinderella consents to wed him on the eve of battle.

Love scenes of Peter Pan simplicity and poetic charm are brought into swift contrast with the harsh struggles between two battling armies for the subtle effect that the audience feels rather than sees, the sweetness and beauty of human nature in creative mood and its coarse and brutal side in the destructive conflicts of great hordes of armed men. No stage play could enforce such powerful and correctional effects. One learns to hate war from looking at such picture plays and to perceive the inanity of man's intolerance and reckless dissipation of energy when he is in fighting mood.

The doughty old Confederate colonel has a flash of enlightenment when he prevents the capture by his own men of the opposing officer who has become his son-in-law, when he considers his daughter's happiness has a claim superior to that of his cause, and a happy ending results when Peace wins the final victory. In complimenting director Burton King for his excellent work I wish to apologize for crediting Mr. Ince—I have fallen into a habit of crediting the Ince brothers—for a play previously reviewed, "The Pride of the South," this being another of Mr. King's productions. Both plays were well devised, well constructed, well acted, and among the best of their kind.

TORNADO AND FLOOD PICTURES.

The history of the recent disasters which have devastated wide and populous regions of this country will be profusely enriched by numerous motion picture versions of the awful catastrophes. The Essanay company made an especially graphic picture of the effects of the tornado that devastated Omaha, Neb. Seven hundred feet of excellent pictures were secured. Three cameramen were sent to Dayton, Ohio, by Essanay, and some good views of the situation there were obtained.

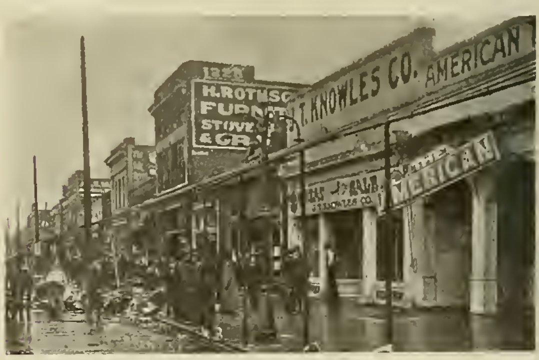
The American Feature Film Company, of Toledo, Ohio, obtained 1,100 feet of views in and about Dayton, taken Thursday, March 27th.

The Selig Polyscope Company hurried several cameramen to the flooded districts of Ohio and Indiana and has secured a 1,000-foot reel of thrilling pictures from scenes at Dayton and other flood-stricken cities.

Messrs. McMahon and Jackson, of the Buckeye Film Company, Cincinnati, Ohio, reached Dayton about three hours after the first reports of the disaster at Dayton. They traveled by automobile, and while in Dayton were able to secure many close views of the frightful devastation at that point. Approximately 800 feet of pictures will be offered by them, under the firm title of the Dayton Flood Film Company. In speaking of his experiences at Dayton, Mr. McMahon said that the scenes at Dayton beggar description. The force of the water was irresistible, wrecking houses, overturning street cars and sweeping everything before it.

YEATON BROS. TO BUY ANOTHER HOUSE.

Yeaton Bros., who run a picture house in Wolfeboro, N. H., known as the "Masonic Temple," and another in Newmarket, N. H., known as the "Star," contemplate the purchase of another picture house in either one of the cities here mentioned. The latter house has a seating capacity of 500 and the former 700. Both houses are modernly equipped and Power's No. 6 machines are used. Yeaton Bros. claim that receipts of both houses have been very satisfactory.



HIT BY THE BIG WIND.

The recent series of high winds and tornadoes that have been devastating various parts of the country, took a slap at Columbia, Georgia, on March 14, causing damage estimated at $200,000. Among those who suffered loss was S. E. Posey, manager of the American theater of that city. Mr. Posey sent a picture of his theater and vicinity, reproduced herewith, showing the effect of the storm.

"A Wise Old Elephant" (Selig)

Reviewed by James S. McQuade.

A BIG novelty two-reel special—the latest addition to the Selig photoplays in which wild animals figure prominently—is announced for release on April 14th. Otto Breitkreutz, better known by his circus name of "Big" Otto, had personal charge of the production, which was made on the Selig wild animal farm, in Los Angeles.

J. Edward Hungerford is responsible for the scenario, which affords opportunities for the performance of some remarkable and sagacious feats by "Toddles," who has the distinction of appearing in the titular role. "Toddles" is best recalled by the human-like intelligence he displayed in "Lost in the Jungle," about two years ago, a photoplay which was in vogue in both the Old and the New World. In the present instance this wise old elephant has surpassed all his former doings, and fairly astonishes us by his encroachments on the field of human thought and action. It must be remembered, however, that "Toddles" is under the absolute sway of his trainer, "Big" Otto, and that the latter, although never seen in the field of the camera, is always somewhere beside his big pet, instructing him what to do and when to do it. One cannot view these extraordinary films without being stirred by a stronger feeling of affection for docile animals.

"A Wise Old Elephant" is distinguished by the inclusion of two of Selig's best known players in the cast—Miss Kathlyn Williams and Hobart Bosworth. The fondness of "Toddles" for Miss Williams is repeatedly shown. He guards her with jealous care and uses his trunk to protect her from her enemies. Indeed all that transpired, in this respect, during the production has not been included in the pictures; for, in one instance, "Toddles" seized the villain in the play and flung him fully 30 yards away, where he lay stunned for a time. Miss Williams sustains the part of Zara Haskins with her well known vim and charming grace. As Lieut. Driscoll, an English officer, Mr. Bosworth is seen to fine advantage in heavy character acting. Herbert Rawlinson, as Robert Harding, and Al. W. Wilson, as Colonel Haskins, complete the excellent cast.

The scenes are laid in India, England's great eastern possession. Colonel Haskins and his only daughter, Zara, live on a plantation to which the old soldier has retired. The adjoining plantation is owned by Robert Harding, a young English gentleman, who seeks his fortune in the cultivation of tea. He has just arrived in the country, and is not acquainted with his neighbors.

Zara is a beautiful girl. She delights in outdoor life and is fond of taking morning rides on her big pet elephant, "Toddles." One morning she meets young Harding. He salutes her with a smile and she stops for a chat. It ends by her inviting him to join her in the howdah, "Toddles" assisting him to mount. As the result of this meeting Zara and Harding fall in love.

About this time Lieut. Driscoll, an aristocratic officer, chances to call at the Haskins plantation, where he is royally entertained by the colonel. He is attracted by Zara's beauty and shows her marked attentions, much to her dislike. Her father is pleased, on the other hand, and shows the lieutenant that he favors his suit. Driscoll begs Zara to accompany him on a ride the following morning. She refuses; but he insists so strongly that Zara grows angry. Then he insultingly asks for a reason and she strikes him with her crop. Afterwards she mounts "Toddles" and soon joins young Harding. Driscoll, who has followed her stealthily on horseback, discovers the lovers and immediately carries the news to Colonel Haskins. The colonel is furious and rides at once to the rendezvous of the lovers. There he berates Harding and is about to strike him, when "Toddles" seizes him with his trunk.

The next day the Colonel assures Driscoll that Zara will be his wife. Zara is called before the two men and indignantly refuses to obey her father. The latter threatens to force her. She notifies Harding and they elope. Lieut. Driscoll spies on their movements and conveys word to the colonel, who is seized with temporary apoplexy at the news. He recovers sufficiently to despatch Driscoll to prevent the clergyman from performing the ceremony. Driscoll arrives too late, as Zara and Harding are man and wife. Colonel Haskins refuses to receive Zara and renounces her.

Three years elapse and the Harding household is blessed with a baby. Zara learns that her father, under the evil influence of Driscoll, is a victim of intemperance. She calls at the old home with her child, hoping for reconciliation; but her father refuses to receive her at the prompting of Driscoll. She calls again, with the same result.

Now "Toddles" takes a hand. He carries the baby and the cradle in which it lies to the colonel. He places the cradle on the steps, but the colonel waves him away. "Toddles" shakes his trunk in token of refusal, and in brute language urges his master to take the child to his heart. The colonel gives in and takes up the cradle with its cooing burden. Then "Toddles" grasps his master's hand in his trunk and leads him to the Harding home.

NEW JERSEY'S LARGEST THEATER IN COURSE OF CONSTRUCTION.

The United Realty & Amusement Company, a New Jersey corporation, with offices at 19 Bergenline Avenue, Union Hill, N. J., has given out contracts and broken ground for New Jersey's largest motion picture and vaudeville theater. The house will be located at Union Hill and will have a seating capacity of 2,300. It will be a thoroughly fireproof building. The most modern improvements will be installed, such as a direct and indirect lighting, an absolutely perfect ventilating system, smoking and retiring rooms on each floor, drinking fountains with a filtering plant, chorus room, twelve dressing rooms, animal stables, etc. The stage dimensions will be 35 feet by 85 feet. It will involve an expenditure of $275,000 and its opening date is set for October 1st, this year. The place will be named the Union Theater. The same company is also building another immense picture and vaudeville theater at Montclair, with a seating capacity of 1,350. This house is expected to be open on or about May 15th, and it will cost around $150,000. The United Realty & Amusement Company also control and operate theaters in Massachusetts and Connecticut. Carl F. Michelfelder is the managing director.

COULD FIND NO TRACES OF INSOMNIA.

Neal Anderson, manager of the Elite Theater, Carthage, Mo., has a funny story to tell us. Here it is: "A couple of nights ago two boys, one twelve and the other six, approached my cashier and wanted to know the price for children. She told them five cents apiece and they went away. Shortly afterward I came out of the theater and stood in the lobby. Again the boys came back and this time to me, asking the price. I told them. They thanked me, walked to the other end of the lobby and pondered. Then the older boy came to me and said, 'Mr. Anderson, can we both get in for a nickle 'cause this here other fellow goes to sleep?' I let them in, but I failed to find any traces of insomnia in the little fellow," concluded Mr. Anderson.

R. D. ARMSTRONG TO PUBLISH BOOK ON FILM INDUSTRY.

R. D. Armstrong, connected in various capacities with the American Film Manufacturing Company since its inception, is the author of a book, "Making the Negative of a Photoplay," soon to be produced. Mr. Armstrong is peculiarly eligible for the authorship of such a volume, having spent more or less time in every department of the moving picture business. Mr. Armstrong was scenario editor and is at present in Hawaii with S. S. Hutchinson, president of the company, operating a camera. He is thoroughly familiar with every phase of the technical work from the time the negative is placed in the camera until the positive prints are run through the projecting machine. Also, he is one of the best known scenario editors in the business.

Plimpton Back From Europe

Manager of the Edison Studios Reports an Interesting Trip Abroad—European Theater Conditions Superior.

LAST Monday found Mr. Horace G. Plimpton, manager of negative production of the Thomas A. Edison, Inc., back at his desk at the Bronx studio apparently much benefited from his month vacation abroad. Deducting the time required in going and coming Mr. Plimpton had about sixteen days in Europe during which time he visited London, Paris, Brussels and Berlin. He called upon many of the picture dealers and makers in London, inspected the Gaumont plant in Paris and saw about all there was to see in Berlin, including the Kaiser's private theater at the royal palace.

Regarding trade conditions Mr. Plimpton told the World representative that conditions in the European market were very favorable for American pictures and concluded from his observations that the demand would, in all probability, increase, at least in the English and German market.

Mr. Horace G. Plimpton.

"We have a good chance in England and Germany," said Mr. Plimpton, "but there is almost no market for American pictures in the Latin countries. The reason is that the character of the pictures we make will not meet the demand in France, Italy and Spain, where the standard of morality is quite different from ours. Pictures are permitted in those countries that we would not dare offer for exhibition or even make here. English taste is more nearly like our own with the exception that the English exhibitor is attracting a better class of people than we are and are offering pictures of a higher class, generally speaking.

"I visited a great many theaters in London and found that they were far superior to anything on this side. The English exhibitor provides for the comfort of his patrons to a remarkable degree. He is able to select his program in the first place and is not compelled to take everything that is offered him. Then his theater is more comfortable than anything we have. The seats are large and comfortable; there is ample space between the rows so that one can pass those seated on either side without stepping on their toes. Most houses have a bar where refreshments can be obtained without leaving the house and, in many, tea is served at the usual hour. Smoking is also permitted. The prices obtained are much better than here. In all the houses I visited I found nothing that would correspond with the usual New York house.

"Probably the finest picture theater in the world is the Gaumont theater in Paris. It is large, comfortable, beautifully decorated and the pictures are brilliant. The projection is from behind the screen. We spent a very pleasant evening there as the guests of Mr. Leon Gaumont after a day at his factory," said Mr. Plimpton.

"I found the theaters in Berlin of a very high class and the pictures shown were interesting, though many of them would not be tolerated here. It is singular to note the distinction made by the German censorship, for the Germans have a very rigid police control of everything, including motion pictures. In Germany everything that is against the law is 'verboten' (forbidden), and the rule is enforced rigidly. Pictures that would not be permitted here for a moment, as gross violations of our ideas of morality, go there without question, but one of our pictures which showed how a couple of hungry tramps lured a husband and wife away from their home so that they could break in and get something to eat, was barred because it suggested an unlawful act. It was 'verboten.'

"While in London, I met Mr. E. H. Montagu of the Selig Company, who wished to be remembered to all the folks in New York. I saw Mr. H. A. Spoor at the Essanay Company's office, but did not succeed in meeting Mr. Smith of the Vitagraph Company.

"I was greatly interested in the methods of the trade in London," said Mr. Plimpton. "All the agents have fine offices and show rooms where the pictures are run off for the buyers. Cigars are passed around and the inevitable tea. Altogether, I must say that I had a most enjoyable time, notwithstanding that I was on the go every minute all day long and far into the night. The change of scene was very beneficial and I feel more like tackling a day's work than I did before. The best part of the trip, though, was getting back for, after all, I like this best," concluded Mr. Plimpton.

Affairs at the Edison studio are as lively as ever. All the directors are busy and the only difficulty seems to be lack of room to work all the companies at once.

INTEREST IN "HIAWATHA."

Educationalists all over the country are taking the keenest interest in the all-Indian production of "Hiawatha" made by F. E. Moore. Dr. Joseph H. Wade, president of the New York Academy of Education, has written to know when the pictures will be shown publicly in New York. He was at the private view and was deeply impressed. And several gentlemen from the New York Museum of Natural History have congratulated Mr. Moore upon the faithful portrayal of Indian life. They marveled at his getting the Indians to do the false face Indian medicine dance. The museum has spent a great deal of money, time and ingenuity getting pictures of the Hopi snake dance, and they would like to add the "false face" film to their collection. Moving picture theaters catering to public school patronage should take advantage of this remarkable offering. All over the country Longfellow's poem is prominent in the English work done in the schools, and there are few children not familiar with it. Wherever the play has been given out of doors they have been the most enthusiastic spectators, recognizing each character at once. Mr. Moore says, "If I could always play to the school children I would not need a reader or a program. Even the little six-year-olds know all about Hiawatha, Minnehaha, Nokomis, Pau-Puk-Keewis, Iagoo and the rest. They become wildly excited when the five-year-old Hiawatha is being taught to shoot and dance by Iagoo. Fortunately there is nothing in the play that leads into mischief; quite the contrary. 'Hiawatha' has all the qualities of a real morality play. Warfare is forbidden by Gitche Manito, and in the end Hiawatha's cordial greeting to the first missionary has always been admired by Catholics and Protestants. Wherever we have played the Sisters bring their little ones to see us." It is this quality in the play that will make it equally successful when shown in pictures.

VITA FILM CO., MAKING A FEATURE.

The Vita Film Company, who are making and importing a number of multiple reel subjects, have opened a number of out-of-town branch offices, and report quite a fair business. Mr. Child, who is directing the Vita's American product, claims to have a winner in the line of a sensation three-reel drama. He has been waiting for good weather to finish the outside scenes.

"Dick Whittington and His Cat"

A Solax Three-Reel Feature.

Reviewed by W. Stephen Bush.

THIS ancient, simple, homely but charming and pathetic story, a bright, particular gem of old English folklore, has been rendered into moving pictures by the Solax company in what appears to me a most acceptable manner. These old lays that have endured for centuries, carrying a good and valuable lesson for every-day use, are scattered all through our literature, but in their wild hunt for lurid and rancid melodrama, directors have pretty consistently overlooked them.

The story of "Dick Whittington and His Cat" is too well known to need repetition here. The Solax company has devoted considerable time and most conscientious pains to a proper filming of the story. The settings and groupings are deserving of high praise, and one or two new wrinkles in photography give the spectator a delightful surprise. An artistic hand shows its touch in almost every scene, and the high quality is well sustained throughout. It is but just to say a word in praise of Vinnie Burns, who took the part of Dick Whittington. This young girl has had the benefit of an earnest and sympathetic director, who has succeeded in bringing her talents to the surface. Her impersonation of Dick Whittington is charming, and even a captious critic can find little fault with the conception and execution of the part. The atmosphere is on the screen; indeed, the very first scene convinces the spectator that he is going to see something of pre-eminent merit.

Scene from "Dick Whittington's Cat" (Solax).

Scene from "Dick Whittington's Cat" (Solax).

There is not lacking that rapid and sensational action which exhibitors seem to insist on nowadays. The burning of the ship at sea, the adventures of the shipwrecked crew, the jumping of Dick's cat into the limelight and the havoc he wrought among a lot of saucy Arabian rats supply an assortment of pleasing thrills.

The pictures of mediæval London are probably as good a piece of work of stage carpentry and scene painting as has ever been seen in moving pictures.

It would be difficult to exaggerate the value of such a production to the exhibitor. The filming of such stories draws the best people and appeals to the cleanest and healthiest taste. The kaleidoscopic procession of cheap melodrama and tiresome "Westerns" cannot be interrupted too often by such pictures as these. "Dick Whittington and His Cat" is a distinct gain to the reputation of the industry and a matter of just pride to the Solax studio.

Activities of the Kalem Company

Will Enlarge Its Producing Forces and Make More Multiple Reel Features—To Build Jersey Studio.

WITH the approach of the summer season the Kalem Company announces a progressive program for the extension of its producing facilities calculated to add materially to the quantity and quality of its output. The recent success of the Kalem feature subjects has convinced the managers of that company that the public is eager for that class of picture and it is proposed to meet the demand while it exists. With the plan to increase the number of multiple reel features the Kalem Company will increase its producing force and its production facilities in general.

A long lease of a private estate in New Jersey has been taken and outdoor studio facilities will be provided for several companies of players. The companies now operating in Jacksonville, Fla., will be brought to New York. Kenean Buel's company will work on large multiple reel productions while the company under the direction of Hal Clements will continue making single reels. Robert Vignola has been promoted to a directorship and will make single reels.

Many changes have been made in the Western companies under the direction of George Melford and J. J. Hartigan, by which they have been greatly strengthened. Mr. Melford's company, located at Glenwood Park, just out of Los Angeles, will hereafter devote its time to big feature productions. This company is now at work on a big picture to be entitled "The Battle of Paardeburg," announced some time ago. In this work Mr. Melford will have the assistance of Captain Price, a veteran of the Boer War.

The Glendale forces of the Kalem Company will be reinforced by Director J. P. McGowan, until recently directing one of the Kalem companies at Jacksonville. Mr. McGowan has done some excellent work since he took up directing. He will devote his time to single reel subjects and some excellent pictures may be expected from him.

Director Melford's subjects will include war and Indian features of the thrilling kind.

Home Offices Enlarged.

While busy disposing its various field forces the Kalem Company has not been unmindful of the necessities of the home plant at 235 West Twenty-third Street, New York. Great changes have taken place in the offices during the past few months. Recently the manufacturing plant, which occupied the greater part of two floors in the Eastman building, crowded the business offices out and a third floor was leased for them. Now one is ushered into a very handsomely furnished office on the fifth floor of the Eastman building when visiting the Kalem Company. Everything is spic and span; the desks of the members of the firm and the heads of departments are ranged along the front of the building where the best light is afforded; all desks are provided with telephone and electric light connections; the bookkeeping department is enclosed by wire lattice and the mailing department occupies a large enclosure in the rear of the building.

In the center of the floor has been constructed a light proof projecting room for the exhibition of pictures that is a model of its kind. The projecting machine has been set upon a rigid standard which will insure rock-steady projection. This is surrounded by a platform and the whole covered with metal to insure against any possibility of fire.

In the matter of features the Kalem Company has been unusually successful. Beginning with the Irish pictures of two years ago, many of which are still prime favorites with the public, the climax was reached in the classic Biblical production "From the Manger to the Cross," which is at once an artistic and financial success. In this connection must be mentioned "The Exposure of the Land Swindlers," better known as the Burns pictures, for the reason that W. J. Burns, the famous detective, is featured in it very strongly. A large number of extra orders have been received for this subject and the demand for posters is unprecedented.

Noted for its novelties in advertising the Kalem Company has fairly eclipsed itself in a recent photo-lithograph of Alice Joyce—by far the most artistic bit of advertising that has come from any film manufacturer.

From the activities of the Kalem Company it may be taken that the product of that company is to be materially increased in the near future.

Motion Picture Exhibitors' League

NEW YORK EXHIBITORS PLAN BENEFIT.

AN immense benefit exhibition is being arranged by the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of Greater New York for the assistance of the flood sufferers of Dayton and other cities in Ohio. It will be a joint affair, under the direct auspices of the league, with all exhibitors working together. The committee of arrangements has provided for the benefit to take place at the 69th Regiment Armory, 25th Street and Lexington Avenue, just off Madison Square, on Saturday night, April 12th.

Mr. M. Needle and Mr. Eugene Ellmore are in charge of the general arrangements. A fine bill has been prepared, with vaudeville, photoplays and photoplayers. Besides the best of the current releases, a number of the best known photoplay stars will appear in person. The benefit will be widely advertised, and for this purpose Mr. Arthur Jacobs has donated 1,000 one-sheets, and some of the various lithograph companies have done likewise. The Kalem company has already chipped in $100 and placed itself and its talent at the command of the benefit committee. Miss Alice Joyce and Mr. Tom Moore, of that company, will appear on the bill.

At the suggestion of the chief of the License Bureau, Mr. Wallace, Mayor Gaynor will be asked to open the ceremony and also act as custodian of the fund. Every exhibitor in Greater New York should advertise this benefit persistently on his screen and do all in his power to make it a tremendous success, which will reflect to the credit of the exhibitors of Greater New York. They should bear in mind that many exhibitors of the Ohio League are in trouble and that they deserve whatever assistance can be given on account of the far-reaching work they did in being the first to establish the Motion Picture League of America.

WASHINGTON, D. C., EXHIBITORS' RELIEF FUND.

The first recognition of the flood sufferers from the amusement world was when President W. P. Herbst, of Washington, D. C., hurriedly called a meeting of Motion Picture Exhibitors' League, No. 10. There was a full meeting in response to his telephone call, and a prompt contribution of $1,000 from those present. A benefit has also been arranged to take place later. Preliminary to this relief fund, contribution boxes are in evidence at the box office windows for the receipt of such sums as the patrons may desire to give.

On a lot containing a frontage of 68 feet to 175 feet depth, on the north side of U Street, near 14th, will be erected a building, the lower portion of which will be devoted to a moving picture theater. The upper stories will be occupied by the owner, Mr. H. K. Dugdale, with his musical publishing company.

ALABAMA EXHIBITORS ORGANIZE.

At a meeting of exhibitors of the State of Alabama held in Birmingham, Ala., Monday, March 24th, the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of Alabama was organized. Forty-seven exhibitors signed the roll, and the following officers were elected: Mr. A. A. Wall, Birmingham, National Vice-President; Mr. E. H. Colley, Birmingham, President; Mr. T. S. Abernathy, Birmingham, First Vice-President; Mr. R. T. Wilby, Selma, Second Vice-President; Mr. John H. Snyder, Bessemer, Treasurer; Mr. J. G. Wells, Anniston, Secretary.

Following the business meeting a banquet was held in the Hillman Hotel, at which President Neff, of the National League, addressed the assemblage.

CONVENTIONS CALLED.

Secretary B. K. Fischer, of the Wisconsin League, announces that the annual convention of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of Wisconsin will be held at Milwaukee, Wis., on Tuesday and Wednesday, April 8th and 9th. The annual election of officers will occur at this meeting, and matters relating to legislation now pending at the State Capital will be discussed. Wisconsin exhibitors are urged to attend this meeting.

President L. D. Milne, of the South Dakota League, has called a meeting of that organization to be held in Huron, S. D., on Tuesday, April 8th. Every exhibitor in the State has been notified and urged to attend, as there are matters of great importance to be considered.

Motion picture exhibitors of Iowa are notified that a meeting of the Iowa Exhibitors' League will be held in Des Moines, Iowa, on Tuesday and Wednesday, May 6th and 7th Headquarters will be at the Savery Hotel. Manufacturers and exhibitors are requested to communicate with Secretary Fred W. Young, 420 Clapp Building, Des Moines, relative to arrangements and exhibits.

W. E. Higgins, secretary of the Sandusky Local, Sandusky, Ohio, has issued a call for a meeting of that organization to take place at Sandusky on Tuesday, April 8th. The order of business has been changed and the regular routine will open with a discussion of topics and conditions. The Sandusky Local now has 23 members out of the 31 in the district, which includes Erie, Seneca, Huron, Ottawa and Sandusky counties. Applications have been received from Gibsonburg and New London.

ANOTHER CENSORSHIP BILL KILLED.

Secretary Young, of the Iowa Exhibitors' League, advises the Moving Picture World that the Burt bill, known in the Iowa House of Representatives as No. 210, an act to provide for the regulation of motion picture films and to establish a state censorship, has been defeated in the House.

The forces against the bill were the members of the Iowa League and the exchanges, marshaled by Secretary Young, who watched the bill on its progress through the various committees and fought it every step of the way. The bill was unfair in the extreme and provided that one man should be the censor, at a salary of $2,500, with $5,000 for assistants and office expenses. To obtain this money a charge of $2 per reel was to be made. The bill and those like it were better dead.

MISSOURI EXHIBITORS KILL TWO BILLS.

Through the vigilance and energy of the Motion Picture Exhibitors League of Missouri, two bills introduced in the legislature of that State calculated to "regulate" the motion picture business, have been killed. One was Senate Bill No. 269 making it unlawful for any person or corporation to exhibit in a public place within this state any picture or other presentation of wild west scenes, public executions of criminals, of robberies, murder or other crimes, of divorce scandals, prize fights, of persons indecently clad or of improper attitude of the two sexes.

The second is house bill No. 537, which provided a license for motion picture shows of $50 to be paid to the State treasurer. Both these proposed laws failed of passage after a vigorous campaign against them by the members of the Missouri league, writes President W. J. Flynn, of that organization.

MASSACHUSETTS LEAGUE OPENS HEADQUARTERS

Massachusetts exhibitors affiliated with the Massachusetts branch of the Exhibitors League, have established a "headquarters" at 25 La Grange Street, Boston. It is proposed to make this a real "headquarters" for all New England exhibitors and already the General Film Company and the Universal have availed themselves of its facilities to show pictures to the assembled exhibitors.

A house warming was held Tuesday, April 1, refreshments were served and a general good time enjoyed by all present. At a meeting held on March 28 President Joseph Mack tendered his resignation as president of the Massachusetts League. The members present refused to accept it and emphasized its action by electing him general manager of the league at a substantial salary. Under this arrangement, President Mack will devote more time to the business of the organization.

PITTSBURGH EXHIBITORS' BALL.

The large English Room of the Fort Pitt Hotel, Pittsburgh, Pa., was the scene Monday night, March 24th, of as brilliant and successful an affair as has been held in that city this winter. The occasion was the first annual dance of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of Pennsylvania, Pittsburgh Local, No. 1, and from start to finish the ball and reception showed the careful work of the committee in charge.

Over one thousand persons attended, including the motion picture exhibitors, with their wives and daughters, and a number of guests, among whom were James Morrison and Tom Powers, of the Vitagraph company.

The ball started at 8 o'clock and continued in the wee sma' hours, with an intermission for a delightful luncheon at 11 o'clock. The motion picture men were there in force, braving the inclement weather, and the ballroom was a brilliant picture with the bright-colored gowns of the ladies and the decorations of the room. Nirella's Orchestra played the dance numbers, of which there were twenty, with four extras. The proceeds of the ball will be devoted toward sending a delegate of the local organization to the big meeting of the leagues in New York.

The officers and, indeed, all the members of the Pittsburgh Local are to be congratulated on the success of the ball, and the many happy expressions of those who attended augur well for future entertainments of this local.

PHILADELPHIA EXHIBITORS' BALL.

Actors and actresses who act for the movies, with their make-ups as bandits, cowboys, safe-crackers, heroes, villains and other characters, appeared in evening clothes Wednesday night, March 26th, as the guests at the first annual ball and reception of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of Pennsylvania, which was held at the Turngemeinde Hall, at Broad Street and Columbia Avenue. It was the biggest social feature of its kind this year. More than 300 persons were present. Local picture men were the hosts. During intermissions the celebrities present were introduced. Thus scores of men and women whose faces have become familiar to the public were presented, and after this formality the dancing began. Some of the actors and actresses are excellent dancers, and they gave little exhibitions of their skill as the night went on.

It was throughout a happy affair. Some of the performers had not met before, but they knew all about each other from moving pictures they had seen. It was quite like a gathering of old friends. Some of the actors and actresses present were John Bunny, Miss Flora Finch, Miss Lillian Walker, Miss Kate Price, A. K. Lincoln, Miss Florence Lawrence, Owen Moore and Rose Tapley.

The committee in charge included Charles Rappaport, chairman; Charles Segall, John S. Greenbaum, Walter Jacobs, H. Berman, M. A. Benn, M. J. Walsh, Edward Jefferies, George H. Roth, Walter Steumpfig, J. H. Walraven and D. Baylinson.

NEW YORK EXHIBITORS NOW FAVOR 450 SEATS.

The twice defeated Folks ordinance is once more before the Board of Aldermen of New York City for settlement. The ordinance as drafted provides for structural conditions that will minimize the chances for panic in case of fire. The principal contention so far has been the number of seats allowable in an auditorium that is not strictly fireproof according to the building code as applied to theaters. In the face of opposition against allowing 600 seats as the maximum for a non-fireproof auditorium, the New York exhibitors have decided to compromise on 450 chairs. Alderman Folks, however, is not in with them in this compromise and is quite determined that 600 chairs shall remain as the maximum in the bill as introduced by him originally. On all other points of the bill the Exhibitors' League agrees with him, but on the 600 chair proposition they think the bill will be more sure to pass by conceding 150 seats, and they will be content if they get 450. As evidence of this feeling, a petition was drawn up at the last meeting of the league and signed by every one of the 65 members present. This petition was sent to the members of the Board of Aldermen, and reads to the effect that the league would be pleased if the board would reject the Folks ordinance as it now stands and accept an ordinance drafted by the exhibitors themselves. The exhibitors' ordinance will be substantially the same as the Folks ordinance, with the exception of the specified seating capacity, which will be placed at 450 chairs. This petition was delivered to the Board of Aldermen at its session on April 1st.

The exhibitors, considering their own separate enterprises, came to the conclusion that not more than 15 per cent. of them would in any event be able to avail themselves of the 600 seat privilege, and not a great percentage of them could enlarge their places to accommodate even 450. Therefore it seemed inadvisable to establish a large maximum seating capacity which would in all probability attract outside capital and be the cause of the erection of many more theaters, owing to more favorable conditions. In short, by gaining the 600 seat privilege they considered that they would be doing themselves more harm than good.

At the meeting of April 1st the New York Exhibitors' League was addressed by Mr. William Fox, who spoke interestingly for nearly an hour, outlining the various stages through which the motion picture business has passed. He told of his opposition to the General Film Company and outlined conditions as he saw them. He also expressed sincere friendship for the Exhibitors' League of New York and regretted that he was ineligible to membership, owing to his being a film renter. At the conclusion of his address he received hearty applause and was tendered a vote of thanks.

THE KID AS A "REPEATER."

It has long been the privilege of the moving picture actor to see himself as others see him. But he rarely enjoys the chance to see himself twice as others see him. Every now and then "dual personality" effects have been gained in pictures, by trick photography, with some well-known grownup as the star. But now for likely the first time a child artist is so featured. The child is the Thanhouser Kid, and in the release of Friday, April 11th, "The Changeling," you see her as both a millionaire's genuine son and his bogus one.

The Kid, by the way, appears this week at Cleveland, Ohio, in a national tour of Mutual theaters. It is said that she is receiving the largest salary ever paid a child of her years in any branch of theatrical work. Her sister assists her in the act, which is an enlargement of the turn she has been doing at benefits around New York City during the past year.

FIREPROOF PICTURE THEATER.

Ground has been broken for a strictly fireproof motion picture theater, which will be erected near the southwest corner of Rural and Washington Streets, Indianapolis, Ind., at a cost of $8,000. The theater when completed will seat 420 persons, and there will be ample standing room at the rear to accommodate about sixty more. The appointments will be up-to-date and luxurious in every respect. Frank J. Geiger is financing the project.

GREEVER BUYS AIRDOME.

H. K. Greever, proprietor of the Dreamland Theater, Vernon, Texas, has purchased the airdome on North Main Street. Mr. Greever intends to run the airdome in the fine summer weather and the Dreamland during the rainy days. Mr. Greever has had great success with the Dreamland.

JUDGE BEN LINDSEY IN PICTURES.

Judge Ben Lindsey, the well-known juvenile court expert, is the latest national character to appear personally in a dramatic production for the movies. A three-reel feature, the story of which is based on real incidents in the history of this most modern tribunal, shows the great contrast between the old way of handling child criminals and the modern method since the coming of Judge Lindsey's Juvenile Court. It features the Judge personally, carrying out his important work of placing delinquent children who have started on the wrong track permanently back on the safe road to good citizenship.

Judge Ben Lindsey.

This production, "Saved by the Juvenile Court," is said to be a thrilling and realistic narration of two great stories of deep heart interest. The first reel depicts the experiences and unhappy ending of a boy started in a life of crime through association with hardened criminals which was forced upon him when he was sentenced in his youth to a prison term for committing a minor offense. The remaining two reels deal with the experiences of a boy and girl who drift into bad company through the inability of their widowed mother to give them the necessary attention, owing to the fact that she is compelled to work every day for their support, and who are saved through the honor system of the Juvenile Court. It is produced by the Columbine Films Company.

NEW FEATURE FILM COMPANY.

The Scarlett Motion Picture Company, a Philadelphia corporation, has been recently organized and is now producing feature films at its new studio, Twenty-third and Vine Streets, Philadelphia, Pa. W. T. Jones, formerly a producer and director, is the general manager of the new company. The concern has been fortunate in securing as its leading lady the dainty and versatile motion picture actress, Miss Eleanor Caines, formerly of the Lubin Company. Jerold T. Hevener, also of that company, has been engaged to direct the productions, with a company of twenty-two persons. The first release will be "Lost Identity," a thrilling Western drama in two parts. The company proposes to release its features through the leading independent feature exchanges. The initial feature will be released in a few days.

CHICAGO LETTER

By JAS. S. McQUADE

An executive session of the Mutual Film Corporation officials and exchange men was held in the La Salle Hotel, Thursday and Friday, March 27th and 28th. Most of the exchange men (connected with the company) west of the Alleghanies and east of the Rocky Mountains were present.

Since the meeting was behind closed doors, nothing can be said of the proceedings, except that they were important and that they concerned the betterment and the future welfare of the Mutual Film Corporation company's interests.

Among those present, as near as can be gathered—for the meeting was kept very quiet, few if any of the trade papers being notified—were: H. E. Aitken, who acted as chairman of the meeting; W. C. Toomey, J. R. Freuler, Mr. Farnham, Mr. Spiro, Mr. Burman, Omaha; Mr. Mandelbauman, Cleveland; Phil Gleichman, Detroit; Mr. Ashbrook, Toledo; Pat Hall, Kansas City; Ben Yudell, Minneapolis; E. H. Brient, Indianapolis; Mr. Mergener, Milwaukee; the Buffalo exchange owner; G. Hutchinson, F. J. Flaherty and R. C. Seery, of Chicago. Mr. Trask, of Cincinnati, was detained by the floods. A banquet was given Thursday night.

In the Bioscope of March 13th Harry Furniss has written an interesting article which touches on British pictures in British programs, or, rather, the lack of them. Mr. Furniss will be remembered by many for his clever cartoon work in Edison pictures, in which he appeared several months ago, and for the well-constructed scenarios written by him to surround his own special work. He was not given an opportunity to test his ability as a producer while in this country, which is to be regretted, for Mr. Furniss believes he is naturally better adapted for the production of his own plays, or those written by others, than he is for scenario writing or acting a part. Mr. Furniss is now being given the opportunity in England to direct the production of photoplays, and we shall await their appearance with much interest.

Many lovers of photoplays in America have often wondered at the absence of English photoplays from American screens. Italian and French makes are with us in abundance. Why not the English? As Mr. Furniss in his article truly says: "When I was in New York, comparatively recently, the only successful plays were 'English, quite English, you know,' written by English authors, while English actors and actresses held the boards. They (the Americans) only want the best, and the best, naturally enough, commands success. Irving, the Kendals, Forbes-Robertson, Sothern, Willard, Hare and numerous others of our front rank actors of recent years have made fortunes in America; while in England they only found it possible to make, comparatively speaking, a respectable living." Then Mr. Furniss bewails the fact that American photoplays are the vogue in the United Kingdom, and exclaims against the dumping of "so-called English pictures" on English shores, in addition to "Wild West scenes and other essential American subjects." "English scenes, particularly those of an historical nature (save the mark!), are released almost weekly," writes Mr. Furniss. "They fairly bristle with absurdities and incongruities, and not by any means infrequently with anti-British feeling; but if the latter is overlooked they are no worse than the home-made historical film—perhaps even better."

There is much truth in this, and American film manufacturers should give the matter careful attention. But Mr. Furniss is disposed to show considerable animus to American films, instead of the fairness of a critic, in the following paragraph:

"It is eminently characteristic of the country that money in some shape or other should play the important part in American picture plays. Band of Hope bathos, hospital scenes and deathbed incidents supply a considerable proportion of the others, and however excellent from a pictorial point of view all these may be, they are devoid of any real interest as far as the British public is concerned. And that this public should be condemned to sit for hours watching an unbroken procession of this class of film, when so many good English plays are kept out of sight, is not right; nor is it fair to the British producer. In due course of time this fact will no doubt sink into the minds of those who pay at the doors. Then, and not until then, will the British producer attain his proper position in the moving picture world."

The fact has long since sunk into the minds of British patrons of moving picture theaters that American films are the best in the market. American manufacturers, as a rule, do not figure up parsimoniously the pounds, shillings and pence that a film will cost before entering on its production. It is quality, not the cost, with all the best of our American manufacturers. When English manufacturers are ready to loosen their purse strings, and pay less attention to arithmetic, when considering the production of a film; when they are willing to pay the price to first-class actors and actresses to appear in their productions, they will have a market in America and we shall be delighted to see their product. Then, and not until then, will the British producer attain his proper position in the moving picture world.

A Suggestion for Flood Benefits in M. P. Theaters.

According to a circular letter sent out to Independeent exhibitors in his territory by J. V. Bryson, manager of the Laemmle Film Service in Minneapolis, his exchange, like many others, has been put to great stress by the recent floods in Ohio and Indiana. The letter, in part, which bears the date of March 29th, reads as follows:

"This certainly has been a week of excitement, trials and troubles for this office. I am taking this means of requesting you to lend us every possible aid and assistance you can in the booking of new releases. The terrible flood through Ohio has absolutely demoralized express service between New York and Minneapolis. For instance, we haven't had a new film in the house all week. The Wells-Fargo Company tell us there are over fifty express coaches on sidings and in the water where the flood is. For this reason, if you don't get your new films promptly, I beg of you to be considerate. It is certainly no fault of mine."

The letter continues, under a sub-head, which reads, "Do you want to run a flood benefit in your theater? A lot of my customers are going to do this. I think it will be one of the greatest stunts you have ever locally pulled off. If the moving picture theaters in the state of Minnesota couuld raise a few thousand dollars it would be a big boost for us all in general. And right here is where I come in: I will give every moving picture show within 1,000 miles of Minneapolis one free change, with the distinct understanding that these films are to be used for a flood benefit only."

Manager Bryson's suggestion and offer are timely; but, in case any such fund is raised, would it not be well to ascertain if any brother exhibitors in the flooded districts, in Ohio and Indiana, are in pressing need of help before the fund is employed for general relief purposes? Charity begins at home, and in this case help should be first extended exhibitors who are in need, if there be any.

Chicago Film Brevities.

Max L. Livingston, assistant manager of J. H. Hallberg's enterprises, New York City, called at the World office Tuesday, April 1st. He is making a tour of the Middle West in the interests of his firm, which deals in complete moving picture theater equipments.

Fred Hartman, of the Hartman Bros., film manufacturers, Omaha, was in the city early last week. Hartman Bros. made a 1,000-foot film of the Omaha disaster. This film will be handled as a special feature by America's Feature Film Company, this city. It is now being shown on the road and is making a big hit.

Henry J. Hallway, manager of the Grand Opera House, St. Charles, Mo., was in the city last week. He called at the World office and paid a visit to the Selig Polyscope Company's plant.

My old friend, Joe Bommerscheim, owner and manager of the Gaiety Theater, Ft. Wayne, Ind., was a visitor at the World office last week. He stated that Ft. Wayne was pretty well flooded at the time he left, but that he was still doing business.

A. K. Brown and P. H. Kilner, respectively, president and manager of the American Theater Company, 24 South Clinton Street, this city, paid the World office a visit last week. The company owns and controls the Hinsdale Theater, Hinsdale, Ill., and the La Grange Theater, La Grange, Ill. The La Grange is a brand new fireproof structure and will be opened April 10th. It was erected at a cost of $24,000. Mr. Kilner stated that the Hinsdale is playing to capacity at the present time. Licensed service being used and 10 cents admission charged. Admission at the La Grange will also be 10 cents. It has a seating capacity of 465.

N. F. Evans, manager of the American Feature Film Company, of Toledo, Ohio, was in the city all last week. He stated in the World office that he had produced 1,100 feet of film showing the flood in Dayton. Mr. Evans stated that he had cut out all superfluous matter in the film, and that every foot will be interesting and full of action. The film covers the devastation very completely. There was no chance of showing any thrilling rescues, Mr. Evans reported, as his party, as well as all the other camera parties on the scene, got into the city on the first relief train from Toledo, on Thursday evening, March 27th, and the waters had receded fully by Thursday night. Any films, therefore, showing rescues will be accused of faking. This film will be offered in the open market, with no restriction as to territory. It will be first shown in Chicago.

Carl Ray, the well-known moving picture theater owner of Muskegon, Mich., writes that he will return home on April 1st from Los Angeles, where he has been wintering for the last three months. He will return to Los Angeles some time in June to begin building his new residence in Los Angeles, in the fashionable residential district of Hollywood, on Hawthorne Avenue and Fuller Street. Mr. Ray reports that all moving picture theaters in Los Angeles are kept very busy.

Screen Club Visited by Flames.

Lively Work on the Part of Members Prevents Loss of Mementoes and Records—Ball Committee Appointed.

THE Screen Club was visited by fire in its rooms at 163 West Forty-fifth Street at 8 o'clock on the evening of March 31. The blaze originated in the establishment on the ground floor, and by some was ascribed to defective insulation. Louis Gellung was one of the first to notice the smoke. He called the attention of the steward and of Herbert Brenon to the fact. Mr. Brenon went down stairs and looked through the window of the store under the club. Then he called a policeman, who turned in an alarm. Mr. Brenon then returned to the rooms and informed the members gathered in the dining room. There was no excitement, but there was much haste. Joe Farnham, going after his overcoat, noticed a package of towels. These he soaked in water and distributed to the volunteer salvage corps, which was working in the different rooms. Pictures were pulled from the walls, records were taken out, the great mirror in the smoking room was carried into the front of the house, the piano was moved and—most important of all just at this time—the badges, tickets and all printing matter on hand for the Screen Club ball on April 19, at Lexington Opera House, Terrace Garden, were taken to a place of safety. Among others who were groping in the smoke were William Robert Daly, "Jake" Gerhardt, and Harold Shaw. All stuck to the ship until after the arrival of the firemen and until they were told in none too gentle manner to "beat it." Flames were then appearing in the library.

The firemen pulled up the carpets, chopped out the walls along the floor for a distance of fifty feet, and made quick work in extinguishing the blaze. The departmental estimate of the damage was $5,000, most of which, however, was sustained by the store on the ground floor. The Screen Club, thanks to the business foresight of President Baggot, is fully insured, and has been from the day the club was fitted up. Mr. Baggot was on his way to the club while the fire was in progress, and was among the first to enter when the firemen gave permission. It is expected that the rooms will be rehabilitated by the end of the week. As soon as the members were permitted to return to their quarters all gathered about the piano, and under the direction of "Bob" Daly heartily sang the Screen Club Anthem. Later a long telegram was dispatched to Vice-President Arthur V. Johnson. It was couched in language that will be understood by none better than its recipient and at the same time testified to the regard in which the Lubin leading man is held by the Screeners.

The fire is bound to arouse still greater interest in the forthcoming ball. The following committees have been named:

Reception Committee: Siegmund Lubin, chairman; Carl Laemmle, Adolf Zukor, P. A. Powers, Harvey P. Salter, C. J. Hite, Charles Jourjon, Herbert Blache, Robert H. Cochrane, A. J. Kessel, Jr., Darwin Karr, C. O. Baumann, James Kirkwood, Mark Dintenfass, Billy Quirk, William H. Swanson, Owen Moore, J. V. Ritchie, Herbert Prior, George Magie, Francis X. Bushman, Louis Gasnier, Harry Meyers, William Steiner, Edwin August, Herbert Miles, Maurice Costello, Earle Williams, Warren Kerrigan, J. E. Balshofer, James Cruze, William A. Bechtel, Irving Cummings, J. Searle Dawley, William E. Shay, Hector Dion, William Oldknow and Edward O'Connor.

Floor Committee: Herbert Brenon and William Robert Daly, chairmen; L. R. Johnstone, Charles Abrams, J. W. Johnston, Al McGovern, Yale Benner, Worthy Butts, Paul Scardon, Charles Arling, B. F. Messen, Harry Benham, Harold Shaw, Joseph Hopp, J. B. Totten, S. M. Spedon, Ed Barry, Julius Stern, Ingvald C. Oes, Frank Tichenor, Paul Panzer, Augustus Phillips, Charles Kessel, Frank Powell and William Garwood.

Ushers: Frank Smith, chairman; Bert Adler, Joe Miles, H. Z. Levine, Dr. Ivory, Moe Streimer, William McCoy, Wendel Milligan, J. Parker Read, Frank Carroll, Lee Beggs, W. J. Welsh, Will Lewis, Matt Snyder, Frank Griffin, Howard Crampton, Billy Haddock, Ed Lincoln, George Blaisdell, George Edward Hall, Hopp Hadley, George Proctor and Eustace Hale Ball.

Joe Farnham is now the corresponding secretary of the Screen Club, Calder Johnstone having resigned his membership in the club.

The Screen Club has opened a subscription for the flood sufferers, the club itself heading the list with $50. The amount is piling up.

SEE 'EM AS GHOSTS!

Marguerite Snow and James Cruze have played every known kind of part in the Thanhouser films except that of—ghost! So it should be with some degree of curiosity that you look for them in the release of Sunday, April 6th, "When Ghost Meets Ghost," wherein the two Thanhouser favorites are the very specters in mention. But it is a specter story that won't scare the youngsters in your audience, for it is a purely comedy plot that is worked up without any "horrors" or "terrors." You see, there's an old comedy bachelor who lives in the funniest old haunted house. The wraiths are a lady ghost and a ghost in armor, and they are around too much to suit the funny old bach. He plans to rid himself of the ghosts by having them meet, for he suspects that they might fall in love and elope. Sure enough, he does "pull off" a meeting, and sure enough they do fall in love and run off. The bachelor, clear of ghosts, settles back in his broad armchair and smiles, but he had figured without his specters. They just loved the old home so they couldn't stay away. Arm in arm, and each gazing lovingly into the other's eyes, they returned.

FRED MACE'S PLANS.

Owing to the floods and the congested condition of the wires, only the bare announcement of Fred Mace's retirement from the Keystone Company could be printed last week. It now appears that he is putting into execution a long-cherished scheme of his of putting out his own product. He will make three reels a week, one split reel of farce in which he will appear, one Western and one Indian or straight dramatic story. These will all be specially written for the stock companies under his management and will be released through the companies making the highest bid for the product. It is possible—even probable—that the comedies will bear the trade mark of one of the licensed manufacturers.

Since he went to Keystone, Mr. Mace has been writing and directing the split reels, as well as acting in them, and for some time past he has been working on a scheme for production on a footage basis. He wired Kessler and Bauman last week his resignation, taking effect to-day. He has been asked by wire to reconsider this determination, but the encouragement he has received has induced him to adhere to his plan.

During his long career with the Biograph, Mace became a tremendous favorite and carried his partisans over to the independent camp when he went over to Keystone. He feels that with no restrictions on his product he can do even better work and for some time past has been engaged in perfecting his scheme, which consists of making production which will suit the personalities of the players instead of requiring them to alter their personalities to fit their parts.

GRAHAM BACK AT WORK.

Cecil Graham, manager of the Northern Ventures Company, which is handling the Harry Whitney and "Lucky" Scott Arctic Pictures, has just returned to his desk after a slight attack of typhoid, contracted on a tour through the New England States.

Doings at Los Angeles

FIRE practically wiped out the big plant of the Universal Film Company at Gower Street and Sunset Boulevard, in this city, early in the morning of March 26th, causing a loss which it is impossible at the present time to estimate. The offices, developing rooms and dressing rooms, valued at about $7,000, were completely destroyed. The unknown factor in an estimation of the total damage is the large quantity of film, both raw and exposed, which was consumed. At the time this is written it is not known how much film was destroyed, but it is certain that among that burned was a large quantity which had already been exposed. Necessarily all of this will have to be reproduced and undoubtedly it represents a large expenditure for production.

Even the cause of the origin of the fire is a mystery. The night force was at work when the flames were discovered in the film department, but they gained headway so rapidly that by the time the nearest fire companies had arrived the buildings were practically gone. There is a supposition that the fire started from an explosion of gas. Fortunately those who were in the plant at the time escaped without injury. The big studio stage located adjoining the group of buildings was protected by the firemen and suffered no damage.

Before the fire had been out an hour preparations were being made for rebuilding and probably in the end the fire will prove to be an advantage, for the buildings had been erected piecemeal as the rapid growth of the company demanded extensions, and, consequently, the arrangements were far from ideal.

Biograph Matters.

The change of policy in the Biograph Company, long ago forecast in this column, came to pass this week when posters were issued bearing photographs and names of about a score of the members of the acting department of the organization. Hereafter the long standing rule, which has enjoined the utmost secrecy about the names of actors and actresses connected with the company, will be disregarded. This long standing rule, which made it a grave offense for any person connected with the Biograph organization to give out any information concerning the identity of the players, has been one of the curiosities of the motion picture industry. Within the last year or two the company has had great difficulty in maintaining the rule because, despite all that could be done to prevent it, the public seemed to have a way of obtaining the information it wanted about its favorites and before the rule was abrogated a number of the Biograph players were as well known to the public as were the members of other companies which take the public freely into their confidence.

Not half of the Biograph players are included in the poster which has been issued, but in all probability the other names and portraits will follow shortly.

Apropos of the new Biograph policy, it may be said that a new character woman made her debut with Director David N. Griffith's company this week. She is Jenny Lee, an exceptionally talented actress who has worked along "legitimate" theatrical lines for many years, but who never posed for the motion picture camera until this week. Griffith has long been noted for his ability to make marvelous finds of obscure actors and actresses who, under his coaching, soon develop into stars of the motion picture profession. Such were Mary Pickford, Blanch Sweet and May Marsh. Jenny Lee is a different type, but she will probably be developed into another favorite. Her first appearance will be as the strong woman who rules her own home in a forthcoming picture which will probably be released under the title of "His Mother's Son." Having been produced by Griffith it will be a Saturday release.

Changes in Universal.

Thomas Ricketts, the oldest director in the Universal organization, who went into it with the Nestor company for which he had directed several years, is at liberty as a result of another change of this week. Harry Pollard, formerly a screen favorite with the Imp company, before the organization of the Universal group, has been promoted to a directorship. Announcement was made last week that Frank E. Woods had joined the Universal company as a director. At that time it had not been decided what brand he would work under. Now it is announced that a company will be organized for him at once and that he will make releases under the Imp brand. Since the old Imp company left Los Angeles immediately after the Universal was formed the brand has not been represented in this field. Woods, who was formerly "Spectator" of the Dramatic Mirror, came to Los Angeles as a Kinemacolor director seven months ago, leaving that company two weeks ago.

The Universal company is starting this week upon a picture which will mark a new departure for it—a venture away from the thrilling, the spectacular and the elemental and into the field of what most directors call "artistic highbrow stuff." Constance Crawley and Arthur Maude, two English Shakespearian interpreters of international fame, who have also identified themselves with everything that is intellectual in drama, have been engaged to appear in film productions of Maurice Maeterlinck's story of "Pelleas and Melisande" and Oscar Wilde's "A Florentine Tragedy." Fortunately they have been assured that no money will be spared in producing these two pictures as they should be produced. As an evidence that in this case everything is really going to be sacrificed to art it may be stated that it is not known how many reels either will make. In other words the story is to be put on correctly without regard to the arbitrary requirements of reels. Either may make one and a half reels or six, but whatever it comes to that is what it will be. If these two experiments are successful other "highbrow" offerings will follow.

Kalem Making Boer War Picture.

Nearly a year ago it was announced in this column that George H. Melford, director of the Glendale Kalem company, was preparing to produce a Boer War Picture called "The Battle of Paardeburg." The arrangements were practically completed when Melford was disappointed in obtaining a number of pieces of artillery of a certain type and had to postpone the picture. Since then it has been ready and postponed no less than four times, but this week, after two weeks' work, he finished it, and the two reels of negative are now on the way to New York. Originally planned to be a single reel release the idea grew as time went on until, when it was finally filmed, it became a tremendous spectacle, the biggest and by far the most expensive picture, Melford says, he has ever made since he became a director. Not only did he take the greatest pains with it, sparing no expense, but luck was with him. In one of the battle scenes a big cannon exploded within twelve feet of the lens, and the camera went on working and got it and the aftermath. The unfortunate feature of the explosion was that three men were injured, Jack Hoxey seriously. Hoxey sustained a concussion of the brain which rendered him unconscious for twelve hours and sent him to the hospital, where he is now convalescing. All the militiamen available in Southern California were turned out for the picture at a cost of $1,200 a day. The cannons used were so large that it cost $4 a shot for powder. Melford literally burned up money in the battle scenes.

Melford, by the way, is soon to cease being a "director" in order that he may become a "producer." A second Kalem company to operate at Glendale is now being organized at headquarters in the East and will be on the ground in a month or six weeks. This will mean a new director and Melford will have an assistant who will practically have charge of the present company, leaving Melford free to supervise both companies. Whether he will also have supervision over the Santa Monica comedy company is not known. His promotion is a well merited recognition of the remarkably fine work he has been doing for the company.

News Briefs.

The announcement that Fred Mace, next to John Bunny probably the most widely known motion picture comedian in the world, has quit the Keystone company is in itself important news, but not nearly so important as what will follow. The details of the other story are not ripe at the present time, but it can be stated that there is every possibility that another two months will see Mace back in the ranks of the licensed companies with an organization of his own under his direction. Mace for several years was the life of the Biograph comedies. Eight months ago he left that company with Mack Sennett when the Keystone company was formed and since then he has been appearing in the Keystone releases. It was not dissatisfaction with the Keystone people, but rather more tempting offers from another direction, it is said, which caused him to resign.

I have received a good-natured reminder from the proprietors of the Union theater at 255 South Main street that the oldest motion picture theater in Los Angeles is still in the licensed ranks. In naming the downtown theaters which have remained with the General company, resisting the blandishments and other more potent temptations of the Independents, I overlooked the Union theater, which certainly was entitled to be well to the front of the list. The proprietors say they have no intention of "bowing the knee to Baal." Since the list was published the California, on Spring street, has opened with licensed programs.

Members of the Biograph company joined with a number of his personal friends, in and out of the various other motion picture companies in this vicinity in presenting Lew Dougherty with a huge solid silver loving cup this week. The cup is a massive vessel holding more than a gallon of "suds" and it bore an inscription stating the circumstances of its presentation. With it went a solid silver pocket flask and a tiny loving cup for Dougherty Junior. The presentation was made at Dougherty's home. Tony O'Sullivan, who lives across the street, lured him over early in the evening long enough for the mob to slip through the alley and take possession of the absent man's home. When he returned he took one look at the crowd and gave up his goat. Dougherty's withdrawal from the Biograph company to go with the Kinemacolor company was a real blow to his associates, for he is the sort of man who makes fast friendships. His departure leaves Billy Bitzer, camera man and inventor of "Biograph photography," the dean of the organization. Like Dougherty, Bitzer has been with the company ever since the Biograph was a "bye," as Charley Murray would say.

Apparently money is no object to the Lubin Company judging by the way Wilbert Melville, producer for the No. 1 Los Angeles Lubin company, has been spending it. For the last two weeks he has been monopolizing nearly all the "extra people" who are available in this vicinity. His daily salary lists must look like a factory payroll. Since he brought his company here about Christmas time he has pulled off a long series of expensive pictures, and the fact that he continues to keep up the pace indicates that S. Lubin is willing to spend his dollars "regardless" so long as he gets results.

W. Christie Miller, the veteran character man of the Biograph company, has been elected an honorary life member of "The Photoplayers" Club. Next to "Pop" Manley, of the Powers company, who was also given the same honor, he is the oldest actor in the business. Russell Bassett, of the Nestor company, who is third on the list, has been promised an election as soon as he adopts more sedate manners.

BRADENBURGH BRINGS SUIT.

George W. Bradenburgh of Philadelphia, has brought suit against the Motion Picture Patents Company, of New York, for damages amounting to $50,000 caused by the defendant's breach of the Sherman anti-trust law. The licensees of the Patents Company are made defendants in the suit. Mr. Bradenburgh claims that Lubin et al have formed a combination in restraint of trade and have deprived him of a source of supply, damaging his business to the extent of $50,000. Triple damages are claimed by the plaintiff.

UNIVERSAL WESTERN NOTES.

F. W. Randolph, who directed for the Universal in the Hawaiian Islands and who has since been directing under the Nestor brand, is going to act from now on as assistant director to Francis Ford in the new series of Cuban and Philippine pictures. Ray Meyers, who has been assisting and acting with Francis Ford, is transferred to Director Jack O'Brien, with whom he takes leads. Alexander Gaden joins Mr. Ford's forces, and will take leads and heavies with him.

The studios of the Western organization at Hollywood are putting the finishing touches upon the wondrously beautiful scenes and props for the forthcoming production of the fairy-spectacle, "Beauty and the Beast." It will be presented under the direction of H. Matthews, and promises to outrival "Snow White." There will be three great scenes—an old-fashioned street, a brilliant court-room, and the grand staircase within the castle.

The Universal has decided to put on a series of pictures dealing with Philippine subjects, as well as with the War in Cuba. These will be produced under the 101 Bison brand at the Providencia Ranch, now known as Universal City. They will be under the direction of Francis Ford, and will start with a picture entitled "Stars and Stripes," descriptive of the Cuban occupation by the United States, as well as a general and correct idea of matters of public interest in the Cuban campaign. The habits and the manners of the natives will be shown and every phase of the conquest of the islands will be pictured. In order that everything may be correct, a large number of special costumes have been purchased of the 1899-1900 period, as well as the arms that were used in the campaign.

Universal City is to have its own furniture factory. The idea had its birth in the brain of R. E. Wortham, boss carpenter of the Hollywood studios, and is due to the many troublesome delays that the furniture houses have subjected them to. On several occasions important pictures have been held up on account of the non-delivery of necessary furniture. Last week, a big freight load of machinery arrived, and is being installed. From now on the Universal will make all of its own furniture—not property stuff, but real furniture of all periods. With its new storehouses complete there will always be a store from which to draw. Each picture will have its own special furniture.

Yet another director has been added to the 101 Bison forces. He is Milton H. Fahrney, who has been connected with the Nestor company since its inception. He starts his new job with a two-reel feature Civil War story, employing the actors and actresses who have been with him so long. Mr. Fahrney has been at work on the new story for some time, but deferred its presentation until he had secured all of the correct costumes and details for its production.

STEWART WHITE AND S. S. HUTCHINSON.

OBSERVATIONS

BY OUR MAN ABOUT TOWN

WHILE not being unduly sentimental or pathetical, our feelings were agitated somewhat by comment made upon the motives of a Brooklyn moving picture exhibitor who offered one day's proceeds of his house to the fund for the relief of the Western floods sufferers. "A clever advertising scheme" was the remark I overheard when the offer was made. Nevertheless the exhibitor is standing by his offer and will turn the proceeds over to the relief committee operating at Columbus, Ohio. The exhibitor is Jacob Krause, whose place is at 895 Fulton Street, Brooklyn. Apparently he was the first of the exhibitors in Greater New York to make an offer of that kind. It is hoped the contribution will be a substantial one and, for the sake of rapping the cynical head that has bobbed up, we trust he will give equal publicity to the acknowledgment of the donation; and it is hoped he will do this even if the proceeds are small. The spirit will be vindicated.

Theaters throughout the country outside the affected zone are advertising benefits for the flood sufferers, New York managers being among the most active, and the only snarling comment heard was the one directed against the little picture house in Brooklyn. The only answer that can be made to the question as to why commercialism should be charged against the offer of the moving picture manager is that it comes from that class of people who are so unqualifiedly and unalterably opposed to moving picture shows that they can see no virtue in them regardless of circumstances. The prejudice is so deep-rooted nothing can even suspend it. Fortunately such people have so rapidly lost the position they once held by hoodwinking a part of the public that did not investigate for itself that the antagonistic spirit is now practically without effect. Lack of faith in the fairness and honesty of purpose has actually brought defeat to some very creditable measures.

It has been stated that the antagonism of clergymen to the motion picture is beyond comprehension. The truth is, but a very small percentage of them are opposed to the pictures themselves. It is the picture theater they oppose. Those in the majority have exhibitions in their own churches and halls. Those in the minority, or most of them, during the campaigns of the past put themselves so strongly upon record they cannot reconcile themselves to a graceful retreat to the ranks of the liberals.

Many of the people who are now staunch supporters of moving pictures are not familiar with conditions as they existed in the past with regard to the antagonism shown against them and the burden exhibitors carried in dealing with it. Opposition to the pictures was not made a straight issue by the opposing forces until recent years, when it developed incidentally in the censorship campaign. The forces that had been fighting for years what they could not attain in or out of the courts saw an opportunity to get it by taking up the censorship agitation, which necessarily placed them on record as being opposed to the pictures themselves to an extent.

Now look the whole situation squarely in the face as it existed in New York City and vicinity and it will be seen that the moving picture people have not been antagonistic to the views of the clergy because they felt the latter were opposed to the pictures themselves. The differences were based upon the belief that those of the clergy responsible for the many agitations were so persistently inconsistent in their declarations, charges and actions that they became unreasonable and many times oppressive. Canon Chase is one of the most prominent and respected men in the field of religious work in this country. No one doubts that he is sincere and animated by the best of motives. But local moving picture history shows that at times he has been overzealous and at other times has given reason to believe he was not consistent.

The original campaign, started several years ago, was against the exhibition of moving pictures on Sundays. Canon Chase was one of the veterans. The claim was that it interfered seriously with the attendance of children at the afternoon Sunday-schools. The motion picture people for the first time entered the plea of inconsistency and discrimination. They pointed out that neighboring theaters were running Sunday concerts and the pictures would be withdrawn if the enforcement of the law became universal. The concerts continued, and so did the pictures. Then a campaign started against the Novelty Theater in Brooklyn, the charges being directed against the pictures. It was shown that the identical pictures exhibited there were identical with the pictures shown each preceding Sunday at the Majestic Theater in the same city, but the latter house was never interfered with. Why the discrimination was made was never explained. The same parties conducting the campaign against the Novelty had equal jurisdiction against the Majestic, but did not act.

Then followed a calm. But it was of short duration. Suddenly a campaign was launched that almost put most of the picture exhibitors out of business. Without a word of warning the building, electrical, fire, health and fire insurance departments fell upon the necks of the exhibitors with demands for alterations and improvements in the houses that brought to most of the proprietors visions of bankruptcy. In many cases the orders were quite proper; in many others the justification for the sweeping demands were questionable at least. There was a strong belief on the part of the exhibitors that the campaign was not entirely due to voluntary action on the part of the departments, especially when those who were not inclined to act promptly because the same action was not taken against regular theaters who were guilty of many of the same violations were told, "Live up to the requirements, or get out of business. Never mind other places."

Then came the morality campaign, then the agitation against admission of children under a certain age, and finally the agitation on the censorship question, which was injected into discussions and ordinances in spite of the emphatic declaration of probably as qualified a jurist as ever sat upon the Supreme Court bench in New York that the proposed measure was unconstitutional.

So when you look the field over and weigh all the conditions and developments carefully, it is not difficult to comprehend that Canon Chase and others of the clergy have been one of the two influences against the motion picture business and their efforts have not been restricted to the censorship agitation. Their opposition is not of the same character as in the past because the obeyance of the laws by the picture people has robbed it of its effect, but there is not one of the latter who does not feel himself justified in the belief, in view of all the past, that nothing would be more gratifying to a certain portion of the opposition than to see all the picture houses wiped out of existence. Why beat about the bush and have picture theater people try and console themselves with the thought that the years of agitations and annoyances they have been dragged through was not due to hostility? The other influence is hardly worth referring to for the reason that the vaudeville and theatrical interests have gracefully taken their medicine. Their fight was a bitter one while it lasted. With them it was a question of survival that made even persecution pardonable. They tried to stay the progress of the progress and not to annihilate them, and some of them are glad to-day that the motion pictures won out. One of the Shuberts recently said: "All of my houses that are not tied up by contracts are open to any responsible people who want to put pictures into them. Why, look at us fellows investing thousands upon thousands in putting up big houses, putting on big attractions in plays and people, and turn over and see these moving picture people walk in and show us how to make money. I used to think the pictures were a joke, but I don't now." And his recent investments show it.

There is one solution for the wiping out of the feeling that has existed between the other hostile influence and the moving picture people. Let the former become reconciled to the fact that the moving picture business is a legitimate one, backed by plenty of legitimate capital invested by people who desire to be recognized as, and demand the right to be classed with, other legitimate and law-abiding people. When causes for complaint arise let conferences be arranged in a businesslike way. There will be found on the picture side enough brains, honesty of purpose and sense of morality to speedily bring about an adjustment of any question that arises on a basis of reason, equity and welfare for all concerned, directly or indirectly. Rushing to legislatures, boards of aldermen and into courts without an effort at arbitration is expensive, and particularly distasteful to the under dog, even if he succeeds in getting on top. Hear the other side before leaping.

"The Fighting Chaplain"

Latest of Kalem Series Dealing with Picturesque Types of Civil War Volunteers.

In presenting their spectacular Civil War dramas based upon historical occurrences, it is apparently the purpose of the Kalem Company to portray the various walks of life represented by the Civil War volunteers. The producers announce that the latest of the season's series, "The Fighting Chaplain," like its predecessors, is based upon an actual happening and the incident of a Vermont minister who, as Chaplain, rallied his comrades in a time of panic, has formed the nucleus of a thrilling production which the scenario writer and director have developed with exceptional skill.

The story concerns Reverend John Barlow, minister in a small New England village, who acquires the reputation for timidity because he believes that a man of peace should not become aggressive at any time. This attitude is particularly distressing to Marian Wells, a girl of the congregation, with whom the minister is in love and who, in response to his proposal, replies that she can only marry a brave man. Barlow joins a regiment of volunteers in which Marian's father is a Captain and as Chaplain he inspires the soldiers to deeds of daring by his stirring sermons. In a terrific combat with the enemy the Captain is wounded and the hospital corps is put to flight by a shower of bullets. Unmindful of the shot and shell the Chaplain carries Wells to a place of refuge. Later Marian arrives on the scene to nurse her father and a large band of guerrillas attacks the camp when most of the troops have left to reconnoiter. The Chaplain directs the construction of a crude barricade and when he sees that the defenders cannot cope with the marauders, he plunges into the midst of the guerrillas and makes his way to the stable-tent, where he secures a horse and dashes after the troops. After a desperate ride he overtakes the soldiers, who return to camp in time to prevent the annihilation of the small party which has valiantly resisted the assault of the besiegers.

Mr. Guy Coombs enacts the role of Barlow with his usual force and finesse and Miss Marguerite Courtot, the sixteen year old "Kalem beauty," brings a great deal of charm to the part of Marian Wells. The stirring battle scenes and the terrific assault of the guerrillas are splendidly conceived and executed.

"The Fighting Chaplain" will be released Saturday, April 26th, and special one, three and six-sheet posters, depicting sensational scenes in the play, may be had from the usual sources.

NEW GENERAL MANAGER FOR NICHOLAS POWER COMPANY.

It is announced by the Nicholas Power Company that they have engaged the services of Mr. J. F. Skerrett as General Manager. Mr. Skerrett is splendidly equipped for the duties of his office, having been for sixteen years associated with the Bureau of Electrical Inspection in the Department of Water Supply, Gas and Electricity of New York City.

The new General Manager entered upon his duty on April 1st, and has already taken a firm grip on affairs. It is predicted that he will prove a distinct aquisition to this concern.

ENTERPRISING CANADIAN EXHIBITOR.

The Moving Picture World wishes to acknowledge a friendly call by Mr. Paul LeMarguand, president of the Starland, Ltd., of Winnipeg, Man. Mr. LeMarquand is one of the progressive exhibitors of Canada. His houses are of the highest class and are quite numerous, extending into the States. The number now totals fifteen—thirteen in Canada and two in the United States. The latest is the Empress of Omaha, which was built at a cost of $165,000 and is considered one of the finest in the country.

Regarding business conditions in Canada, Mr. LeMarquand expressed himself as well pleased. He was accompanied on his trip to New York by his father, Mr. A. LeMarquand.

Advertising for Exhibitors

Conducted by EPES WINTHROP SARGENT

Send Out Checks.

SENDING out a small check ostensibly to pay for time consumed in reading an advertisement, but in reality to attract attention, is no new scheme, but Taylor and Ford, of the Star Theater, Cripple Creek, Colorado, appear to have been the first to apply this to photoplay. They sent out actual checks that were good for two cents each at the State Bank, the only difference being that these checks are void after thirty days; a detail that few of the recipients will notice. They write:

> The enclosed circular letter with bank check, is self-explanatory. We mailed out one thousand of these and results were highly satisfactory. Cripple Creek has a population of about 5,400, and we played to a total of 2,532 paid admissions for the three nights. To date, only 11 checks have been presented for payment, the actual cost being printing and stamped envelopes same as herewith. The scheme seems to be a good one in a small town, for it had everybody talking about the Star.
> We have a regular mailing list of 700 which we use once every six or seven weeks, always sealed with 2c stamp, and about 600 of same being addressed to women; find this a better business getter than three times same amount of money expended in hand-bills or dodgers.

The letter read as follows:

> Enclosed please find our check in the sum of $.02 to your order to pay for two minutes of your time.
> We wish you to know that we are showing a better class of moving pictures—MORE REAL FEATURE PHOTOPLAYS—than ever before, while our vaudeville attractions are equal to, if not superior, to those of the past.
> Next Sunday, March 9, for three nights only, we are bringing here the celebrated two-reel FEATURE SUBJECT, "THE COWBOY MILLIONAIRE," and we particularly desire you to see it, and pass criticism on it. Thanking you for past patronage, we are,
> Very truly yours,
> TAYLOR & FORD, Star Theater.

The letter is in typewriter type but printed with straight inking instead of through silk. The check will attract attention without too close an imitation of typing in the letter. The checks that were put through went through from curiosity and simply add to the value of the scheme since the recipient is generally careful to assure all her friends that the check was really good.

We think that a more ornamental check would have been even better. We have two checks of The Great Lafayette, who was killed a couple of years ago in a theater fire, that brought him more advertising than his posted paper. Both are rather large and carry scenes from his magical act, his own portrait, the picture of his dog Beauty, and much extraneous advertising. Embossed checks would not have paid for this run of 1,000, but a half-tone of "The Cowboy Millionaire" on the back of the check would have attracted even more attention.

A Cameraphone Idea.

The most recent Cameraphone Bulletin to hand carries an interesting back page in which the result of a recent contest is given. It will interest other thinking managers:

> Two weeks ago we spoke of being curious to learn the impression made on the minds of many school boys and girls by their frequent visits to our theater. We offered three-months' passes to those who sent in the best letters. A number of them have been received, but we can only quote from most of them, on account of lack of space.
> However, we have decided to print in full one letter we consider especially good. It is from Mr. Russell Willison and reads as follows:
> "Moving pictures are a benefit, not only in the amusement which they afford, but also on account of their educational features. The habits of wild animals, the growing and development of plants, incidents in history, scenes from foreign countries, scenes of construction, such as the Panama Canal, and experiments of mechanics and science may all be seen by means of moving pictures, and often in no other way. Again, old masterpieces can be reproduced with more realistic settings than the original, and the current events are kept continually before one's eyes.
> "The most important element in regard to the educational side of the moving picture is the fact that these things when once seen are remembered much more easily than something that has merely been read or heard of.
> "Although there are some theaters which show only scenes of crime and excitement, and it is doubtful where there is any benefit to be derived from such, yet it is undoubtedly true that the higher grade theaters are of benefit to its patrons. Truly yours,
> "RUSSELL WILLISON."
> Silas Adelsheim in his letter says: "They give you high ambitions and teach you to always do what is right. In different pictures you see the works of nature, the making of the products of the world and the different types of man and animal."
> So it looks to us that our policy of showing something of an educational nature in each day's program was having the effect we are trying for.
> John F. Burke writes: "They have increased my imagination, and a good imagination is very important in school work. They have given me valuable points in history, chemistry, geography and other studies which I would not have been able to get from books. They have shown means for preserving health which we would never hear of at school. They help in giving us an idea of the people and places outside our own city and country. Many places we would never be able to visit are made familiar to us by the moving pictures."
> Paul McNamara tells us: "They help me in my studies, especially the 'Current Events,' which help me in history; they instruct in matters concerning manufactures, and enlighten in the manners and customs of foreign countries."
> Mr. John Kleman says: "The industries of the United States and of foreign countries are educational and interesting. I like pictures like the tobacco industry, cotton industry and the rubber industry in India. The scenic and historic pictures are also interesting. The historic pictures help me a good deal in my studies, because it is easier to remember a picture when shown on a screen than to remember it from a book."

There is more to the same effect, but enough is shown to prove that such a contest can be used to offset any agitation against the picture, or, as in the case of the Cameraphone, to create an effect where there is no such opposition.

Another Scheme.

Another Cameraphone scheme is the presentation of a lucky coin on a certain night, this being of composition metal. It will be accepted at a valuation of ten cents in payment for a dollar book of tickets, or may be carried as a pocket piece. Having several houses, the cost may be distributed among the group, but the coins themselves are inexpensive, once the dies are procured.

Got Up Behind Them.

Clean Wade Mount, of the Martz Theater Company, Tipton, Ind., sends the details of a scheme that can be worked to advantage in any town of ten or twelve thousand or under. We hope that he will send in the details of the coming contest he speaks of. This assuredly should be a business-getter almost anywhere it is practicable to work it.

> We have just terminated a business-stimulating contest that, because of its success, we recommend to exhibitors in cities of 15,000 population and under.
> By the aid of a local photographer we had rear view snap shot pictures taken of thirty of our most prominent and well-known citizens, men and women, the subjects themselves not being aware of the fact that their pictures were taken. For two weeks prior to showing these pictures we kept throwing upon our screen the words "Who Are You?" also ran blackface 12-point locals in each of the papers. Curiosity was naturally aroused. We then announced that we had these pictures; that we would throw five of them on the screen each night until the full thirty had been shown, the one guessing nearest correctly who all of them were to receive $10 in gold; in case of tie, to be decided by lot. On next to the last night we announced the reproduction of the entire set for the following night, giving all an opportunity to make a guess.

> With most unfavorable weather conditions, our house was taxed to capacity on the last evening for both shows (we seat 1,000), and the business throughout the contest was more than a hundred per cent. increase.
> Many, of course, did not register their guesses, but of over a thousand registered, but two guessed all correctly, and the largest percentage of error was upon perhaps the two best known subjects shown. A large number guessed all but one or two, many being as easy to identify as if front views had been taken.
> We were more than pleased with the result of this contest, and have in mind the production of another similar, and yet much different, one in the near future. In cities where everybody knows everybody else and everybody's business we believe this character of a contest will always win.

More Argument.

Here are some figures that may be changed to suit local conditions and drive home the argument that nothing is cheap but the price. It comes from A. R. Lawrence, of the Bijou theater, Edmonton, Canada, and each leaflet, distributed through the mails, carried with it a strip of several frames of the Coronation of King George V.

THOUGHTS FOR 1913

$1,000,000	Would not purchase the real estate and property occupied by the kinematograph theaters of Edmonton.
$100,000	Will not pay the salaries of those employed at the kinematograph theaters of Edmonton during 1913.
$40,000	Represents in part the amount to be paid by the kinematograph theater managers for the use of films to be shown in Edmonton during 1913.
$7,000	Will hardly be sufficient to pay the electric light bills of the kinematograph theaters for 1913, besides licenses, water, telephone rates, taxes, etc., to the city.
$1,000	Is a drop in the bucket for the advertising expenses of the kinematograph theaters to get you and others to attend.
$250	Will not pay the printers for the tickets used for admission to the Edmonton kinematograph theaters.

These are but a few of the financial items to be considered.

BUT

10 Cents Will purchase your admission to the original, pioneer "Moving Picture" theater of this city, "The Bijou" ☞ on McDougall Avenue, opposite Post Office. There might be some "just as good" but there are none better to give you the worth of your money.

'Nuf ced.

Matinee every afternoon, 2:30 to 5.

THE PIECE OF FILM .

enclosed is a portion of the "Coronation of King George V" pictures which were shown at the Bijou at the time.

More Money Dodges.

The Rex Amusement Company, of Marysville, Kans., has also been distributing money, taking advantage of the new five-cent pieces which have the relief of a buffalo on one side to give a Bison souvenir. C. R. Blazier, the manager, writes:

> I secured an all-Bison program for one night and advertised it big for a week as a Bison Souvenir Night. I put Bison all over the place and then raised the price from five and ten cents to ten and fifteen cents. With each admission I gave the souvenir, a 1913 nickel with the Bison. The response was so great that I ran out of my supply of nickels before the second show was hardly begun, though I had laid in a supply I thought sufficient to meet all needs. I secured the nickels from the bank. The idea was effective, without expense, and made more talk than I anticipated.

There are a lot of good angles to this idea. In the first place everyone is anxious to be one of the first to obtain one of the new coins. Not knowing that this was to be the souvenir, the surprise added to the attraction and at the same time a mild but pleasant sense of "sting" increased the laugh. For the increased admission a full return was given in money. No one was out and everyone went out talking of the cleverness of the manager. The whole town probably knew the next day what those Bison souvenirs were, and commented on the effectiveness of the idea. It is odd that none of the large town managers thought of this idea, though several have reported that they gave out new coins in change, following the lead of the United Cigar Stores in the towns covered by that organization.

Speaking of Souvenirs.

And speaking of souvenirs, we have had good reports of the Good Luck banks advertised several times in the pages of this paper. It is a small nickled affair in the shape of a horseshoe that opens automatically when the tenth dime is dropped in. They can be had with the name and address of the theater stamped on the back for five cents each or less, according to the quantity ordered and they make novel and effective souvenirs, particularly in the houses where coupon books are sold. One house used them without special stamping and tied to the ring of each a card that read:

COUPON BOOK OF 24 TICKETS to the UNIQUE THEATER.

It is something that appeals to child and adult alike and to all classes of patrons. Better still, it completely fills the demand for something that will be retained as a permanent advertisement.

Up To Its Standard.

The U-Kum Theater, Toronto, sends in some paper that proves up to the high standard of this house. We are particularly interested in a six-page folder advertising "Shylock" and "It's Never Too Late to Mend" and giving a sound argument on the fire scare. The best line reads, "It now remains to have a Board of Censors appointed to examine the heads of the men who supply the nonsense to the dailies relative to the picture shows." It's not the film or the fire that makes the panic, but the fools in the audience and the argument soundly states that "the safest place in a panic is the seat you're sitting in."

George D. Perry, who runs the house, has the trick of wording his advertising attractively and then getting a good typographical display. The best appeal can be killed by poor display. The copy and the printing must be equally good or the full effect is lost. He seems to favor a single sheet of heavy cream paper, almost a yellow, with the title in very bold-faced type, the name of the house and date in a lighter line. Whatever the display the title, the U-Kum and Tonight are the three lines that stand out above all the rest and catch the eye in that order. Ninety-nine times out of a hundred this is the only proper relation. The hundredth time there is something in the copy that is really more important than the title. For one of the Selig animal plays, for example, "Another Great Lion Play," would be a better display line than the title of the story, which would not convey as much of the idea.

Above all, the stuff is not only well displayed in the arrangement of type, but it is well and cleanly printed. It looks at first glance like the printing of a regular theater and not like the slop job of some "dump." It represents the house properly.

More Cameraphone Ideas.

The Cameraphone (Pittsburgh) Bulletins offer prizes of books of tickets for the children doing the best composition on "Shylock," recently shown in their houses and have James Morrison and Tom Powers to follow Francis X. Bushman around their circuit.

A new wrinkle of the Bellevue house is a write-up column for the local advertisers that probably is as eagerly read as some of the film stuff. Those bulletins will yet merge into a weekly magazine, with all that implies. They have the newspaper sense (though now and then they slip up on cuts) and they get out a readable publication that could be made to show a profit other than in the business brought the house.

Keeps to Himself.

J. A. Dundas, of the Julian Theater, Chamberlain, S. D., sends one of his weekly programs and adds:

> Have had several chances to put the local merchants' advertising in it, but concluded that I wanted to keep it entirely for myself. To my notion this gives the patrons the feeling that the program is gotten up for them and not for profit.

We do not agree with Mr. Dundas, as we have repeatedly said. It seems to us that if the Metropolitan Opera House, New York, can get a five figure price for its program privilege, that the photoplay houses can break even on their programs without loss of dignity or effect.

We believe that the advertising of local or national advertisers gives the house a certain standing, a certain guarantee. There is prestige behind the use of advertising that counts. Amusement seekers are so used to advertising in programs that they are more apt to be impressed by its absence than its use. The Julian program is on cheap news paper, the sort used in printing a daily. Good presswork cannot be had on such a stock and the result is a skimpy four-page folder 4½ x 9 inches that certainly does not impress one as much as N. E. Chaney's handsome program that pays him a slight profit, gives him five or six times the space at Mr. Dundas' command and carries a lithographed cover, yet Mr. Chaney is in a small town, probably no larger than Chamberlain.

We do not believe that Mr. Chaney's patrons remark the use of the foreign advertising and they most assuredly do remark the handsome cover and the good printing on book paper.

Spread It Out.

But even with the program he is using we believe that Mr. Dundas could do vastly more than he is doing. On the front is merely

The Julian.

On the back page are seven lines one-third the width of the page is run this statement:

> WE always aim to arrange our program with our exchanges from our library of film stories. We will be glad to get any that you may wish to see.

That is all the use that is made of the program other than the three change program on the two inside pages running from two to fifteen lines each subject. Even where there is no competition the management should prepare for the inevitable advent of an opposing house by implanting the Julian idea in the minds of its patrons. Much that is printed in this department may be copied with profit. Much in the other pages of this paper can be adapted with profit. It is apparent that Mr. Dundas not only does not believe in advertising other concerns, but draws the line at advertising even his own business, though that is what a program is for. The program descriptions are well worded and apparently are original with the house, but that's all the more reason why other matter should be written; not about the particular subjects to be shown but the goodness of pictures in general, the comforts of the theater, the excellence of its offerings and anything else that will help to make new fans and keep the old.

The PHOTOPLAYWRIGHT

Conducted by Epes Winthrop Sargent

Add These.

Herman E. L. Beyer adds to the collection of plots for the prohibited list started lately, and a couple of photoplay editors write that they will make additions presently. Come in yourself with your most detested bromide. Remember that these plots are not strictly barred, but unless you can give them a brand new twist it is better not to write them. Mr. Beyer cites an exception to his own No. 8 in "The Trail of Cards" an American release, in which the twist is new.

> 7. Baby's shoes. Edison, Majestic, Reliance and other companies have worked out all the sentiment attached to them. Bannister Merwin, Robert E. Coffey and other authors have reunited separated couples by means of baby's tootsie-wootsies. Give them a rest.
> 8. Two suitors for the hand of a girl. They go to one of the parents to decide, or she decides to give them a common task to perform. One wins by foul means. He is found out, and she marries the other.

Paste This Up.

We've done a lot toward making blondes and brunettes out of red-heads, and mostly they've thanked us. Here is a letter from a recent correspondent that tells its own story. Read it and then paste it over your desk to read again when you feel like writing murder into a letter.

> I must write and thank you for your kind advice through the columns of the Photoplaywright. Some time ago I wrote you very indignantly, of the marring of a script submitted the Majestic company and called on you for a means of redress. You very calmly told me to take the matter up with them in a nice way and they would probably pay for the recopying. I rewrote the script, and in doing so saw where I could vastly improve it. I then wrote Mr. Hopp Hadley a letter, saying that I knew from the appearance of the script on its return that he had intended producing it and had changed his mind, and begged him to give it another look over in its improved form. Answer today, offering me forty dollars for it, which I immediately accepted. I see now if I had "painted for war" and gone ghost dancing at the company I would, in all probability, have had the script returned without a reading. Verily, a mild letter getteth the goods.

What Happened to Jones.

Marc Edmund Jones, until recently head of the Chicago Circle, came on to New York for the photoplay writers' dinner, and is not going to use the return half of his ticket for a while. He finds that he can learn more in New York in a week than in a year in Chicago, for this is the fountain head of production for a majority of the companies. He has been visiting the offices and the studios and he has come upon a point that throws a light on the complaint of the novice who thinks the story he has had turned down so much better than the one he sees on the screen. This is what he found out:

> In visiting the studio of probably the largest concern producing pictures I was surprised to find the same condition of affairs as exists in the other studios I have visited. The editor told me of picture after picture that had been spoiled by poor direction—in fact, poor direction seemed to be almost the rule rather than the exception. And this in spite of the fact that a director in this studio is not allowed to change a script in any particular without an O. K. from one of the heads. This, then, was the first point. A picture in a studio, whether of the leading concern or another, is very apt to be poorly directed. The second thing that I discovered was that here, as well as elsewhere, a picture is very apt to be overtaken, and that 1,400 feet is not unusual. This means that 400 out of 1,400—or really 500, as the leaders have to be put in—that over a third of the business of the picture has to be cut out after it is taken, not rarely, but very often. And so a picture not only is apt to be poorly directed, but is apt to have about a third of its action cut out. That covers what the director can do to it. Then there is the Censor Board, who, in, the case of another concern, cut out a little over half of the total footage submitted to them. The picture which has been badly cut has cost too much money to throw away, and so, while there are sometimes retakes on some of the scenes, the break is usually patched up with leaders. And then there are the leaders. In this particular studio the script calls for the least possible number. One of the heads will view the picture and order leaders in at various points. The Censor Board often will order in a leader here and there to make a point clear which they figure will be obscure. And then, whenever there is a break, due to a cut-out, the editor is ordered to write a sub to cover it. The net result of all this, and the point at which I drive, is merely this: The screen is no criterion of the standard demanded of the author before his script will be purchased. After visiting a good many studios, and talking with a good many of the editors, I believe that the average script turned over to a director is of a pretty high standard. But the standard of direction is very low, and the manufacturer is not so much in need of director-proof stories as he is of directors who can put a story on the screen as well as it is written; who can compute footage, and who is familiar with the type of presentation that will "get over" with the censors, the critics and the public. The screen should be the criterion for the author's work, but it certainly is not at this writing.

There are a few studios, notably that of the Edison company, where the length of each scene is pre-determined, where the scene that is given 50 seconds must be turned in 50 feet and is rehearsed and cut down or built up until it does, but in a majority of cases the picture is made first and measured after, and the gaps must be bridged with leader, and this does not always make for interest, but just the same we have small sympathy for those who know their stories are better without having seen them screened. Mr. Jones supplies a solution we have offered before, but he states his case plainly, and so we're passing it along.

Naughty Mr. Beyer.

We are a little bit ashamed of Herman E. L. Beyer, who runs a couple of weekly papers in Newark and runs a couple of photoplay departments in that couple of papers.

In a late issue he writes in answer to an inquirer:

> We never heard of any comedy being improbable. If the scenario editor tells you that, he ought to go to night school.

We're going to run a small night school for Mr. Beyer's benefit.

There was a time when nothing was too absurd or improbable for filming. We were overrun with inane stories of love potions and powders, laughing powders, crying powders, miraculous transformations and all the stale devices of ten years ago. Then the real photoplay came and with it an audience of a higher intelligence and a more discriminating taste. It quickly tired of pills and potions, it grew weary of water throwing and senseless chases. It wanted something with some idea to it, and it led to the establishment of a higher standard of comedy ideas.

Broadly speaking Mr. Beyer is right. Nothing is too improbable if intelligently handled. Improbability would bar from literature Anstey's Vice Versa and kindred stories, the whole range of Fairy tales and the imaginative work of Verne, Wells and others of that school. But is must be remembered that these men write creative matter. As a general thing the pictured action differs from the printed book in that greater reality is now demanded. When we read of men and women we use solely the imagination, falling in with the mood of the author, but when we see the photographic images of actual men and women on the screen there is a jarring note struck when they do things that persons of flesh and blood would not naturally do, and so, unless in a palpably evident fairy story, a certain degree of probability is demanded even in farce, where there is greater latitude than in comedy. Unless you have the genius of a Wells and can create a realistic atmosphere of unreality and maintain it throughout the run of the film, you must make your people do the things that people could do. You must adhere with reasonable closeness to probability.

If you write a story of a henpecked inventor who invents a flying machine to take him to the moon to escape his shrewish wife, and play most of your scene on the surface of the satellite, then you are not too improbable, since you advertise the fact that you are dealing in improbabilities and impossibilities, but where you hold to the atmosphere of daily life yet turn out a story that is so wild and improbable that no one can grasp your viewpoint, then you have turned out a comedy that is too improbable for a story of daily life and yet not sufficiently fantastic to claim a place among the unrealities, and it does not take an extended course in night school for the photoplay editor to realize that the story would be an absolute failure on the screen.

We hope that these few lines will find Mr. Beyer well and that he'll get the point. It's one of the causes of failure with so many writers that they think that any old idea, no matter how silly, will do for comedy.

For Mr. Brewster.

Eugene V. Brewster jumped on William Lord Wright instead of us in the last issue of the Motion Picture Story Magazine, but we still remember that he said he knew little or nothing of the schools he defends. Here is an extract from a professional man in Birmingham, Ala., who knows what he is talking about, because he sells plays himself. He writes:

> I also wish to congratulate you upon your fight on the fake schools. While I have not been one of their victims, I know a woman here who has separated herself from $50 to one of these charlatans. Your stand on this question is a parallel with the fight made by Collier's and the Ladies' Home Journal on patent medicine frauds.

Mr. Brewster makes the suggestion that we direct our efforts toward making the schools good instead of discouraging them. You can't make a fakir a teacher by encouragement. Listen to this, regarding one of the so-called colleges:

> I have finally got the goods on ——. He suddenly abandoned his college (located in Ohio) and skipped to St. Louis. Those taking a three months' subscription offer have nothing in return. One woman in California sent in $30 for a course of lessons, got five in six months, and can get no further information. I have taken up the matter with the Postoffice Department and I think I'll put him out of the business.

Another school is already suffering from the attentions of the postoffice inspectors and narrowly escaped a fraud order. We fail to see that encouragement is what they need.

Further Up the Street.

Russell E. Smith, photoplaywright and former editor of the photoplay end of the Magazine Maker, has gone further up Main Street and is now assistant editor of the Cavalier, of the Munsey string. He writes that they are in need of humorous short stories—which will be good news to the photoplay writers who also dabble in fiction.

Quantity and Quality.

Harry E. Cittel, a Philadelphia aspirant, writes that he has become a regular, having hit the market at last. He adds:

> When I first began to write I could write five scripts a week with ease, and they came back as fast as I could write them. I began to write last May, but did not get a copy of Technique of the Photoplay until two months later. After reading it I was ashamed of what I had sent out. I dished them and began anew. Now it takes me a week to write one, and it takes them longer to get back. Some don't get back; they stick. I thank you and your little brown book for my success.

That's the answer to a lot of other writers who wonder why they cannot sell. They write too many and send them out still raw. Technique of the Photoplay is not essential to success, but some means of arriving at a realization of the fact that a photoplay is not merely a string of more or less related incidents is necessary before the real stuff is written and elaborated. If you're in a hurry to sell, do not be in such a hurry to write.

Press Clips.

It's going to be a mighty good thing to keep away from most press clips. A few months ago we used a World headline and ran into a story Lloyd Lonergan had written for Thanhouser, and this week M. G. Blackford sends in an Associated Press dispatch, with the suggestion that it seems to him that it should make a corking good play, though as he has not seen it done he may be mistaken. The story is that some men tie a dynamite cartridge to a dog's tail, light it and run. The dog runs after them and they are all badly stunned in the explosion that followed.

We don't like to say how many years ago we laughed at this joke, but it has been a stock story for a longer time than some photoplay writers have been on earth. Only the other day it was made into a photoplay.

The point we want to make is this: Most newspaper men who contribute to papers in other towns are paid for what they have printed, instead of getting a regular salary. When things do not happen fast enough they work over old material and send it out in as attractive a form as possible, in the hope of adding to their space. We have noted of late a very decided tendency to take photoplays and "put them on the wire." Some writer sees it, copies it and, unless his previous reputation is good, stands a chance of being accused of theft.

Keep away from the press clipping these days. It is likely to be loaded at both ends.

And in this connection it is interesting to note how trained writers will follow the same general lines. At the Inquest Club the other evening George Hennessy, who is a prolific writer, was speaking of writing to order, and we offered to make a comedy of any suggestion that did not include death. He nominated a topic. We mailed him our copy at 11 the next morning, and he came in with his shortly after noon, and before he had received ours. The basis of the two scripts were the same, though the handling of the plot differed very materially. Anyone not familiar with the circumstances would have supposed that a story had been given to rewrite, yet the "tip" contained two words only. That's another reason for avoiding press clips, particularly those that are themselves suggested by a play.

Waited and—

A few weeks ago an author wrote and wanted to know what to do about a couple of scripts that Frontier and American had. We suggested that she wait. She did, and sure enough she got the checks. If she had written, the probabilities are that, while she would have been paid, as a matter of course, she would have gotten herself written down as one of those over-eager persons who bother the editor. Sometimes it seems hard to wait, but it pays in the long run.

One Side of Plagiarism.

A writer whose name would be familiar to the readers of this department writes:

> Just a line to ask you if you will give us a word sometime regarding apparent plagiarism. A few days ago I received back two scenarios from Universal, one of which was marked "Identical to magazine story," the other "Similar theme used before." In neither case was I aware of it, and these scripts had been out several times, and I could not understand why they did not sell. for I thought them particularly good. From my experience I know enough about copyright not to be fool enough to monkey with it, and yet here was I infringing, and thereby perhaps getting myself "in bad" with the companies. Now, I am wondering how many of my rejections were from that cause. The only thing I want is for you to appeal to the editors to have charity and for them to believe that in most cases one does not willfully infringe.

About the same time a friend of his, in a chatty letter, spoke of this correspondent's activities in writing a story a day, and unconsciously supplied the answer to the query. The first correspondent is writing six or eight plays a week. He is writing beyond his creative ability, and unconsciously he taps the stores of memory and picks from thence the plots he cannot originate. We believe that he is completely honest in his statement that he does not knowingly plagiarize, but he does not stop to consider his source of inspiration. He wants to write—write all the time. He is unwilling to stop and think, and so he takes the first thought that comes to him, and does not realize that it is something he has read somewhere. He needs ideas, and so he takes the first thing to hand and wonders how he comes to get such good ideas. It is not until he has been told a number of times that he realizes that he is merely writing what he may have read long ago. It comes to almost every busy author to realize now and then that he has done a story that really is not his, but the practiced writer is generally more careful of his inspiration and examines it to see whether or not it is his own. We think that if this correspondent will write a couple of plays a week he can sell more, because he will be doing his own creating

It isn't what you write that counts. It s what you sell

Titles.

Here's a little wrinkle in writing titles. Take a sheet of paper about two-thirds as wide as it is long. It doesn't matter what size the paper is. Letter in the title of your story about the way it will look on the poster of the play. If it looks too long, cut it down. If it doesn't look right, smarten it up a bit. The title must look well on the poster, and it must be catchy to rouse the curiosity. Try the miniature poster sometime and see if it helps you. It has helped some.

Looks, Not Sound.

One of the reasons why so very many photoplays enrich only the postal service is that a majority of authors fail to visualize what they write. They write for sound, not looks. If the stuff reads well it is deemed a story and sent out, but the stuff that reads all right may not look well on the screen. If we say that Mary comes into her room and takes a bath it reads all right, but the film manufacturer who sought to make such a picture would presently be conducting his business from a cell in some Federal prison.

This is an extreme example, of course, but there are thousands of little things that read better than they look and if you bend your energies to making the thing read well you'll never turn out stuff that can be depended on to look well.

You can't interest the editor in your literary style. He is looking for plot and business and your high flown phrases will be mentally reduced to business by the competent editor. The editor doesn't read your story at all. He sees your story and if it doesn't look right it makes no difference how finished and fluent it may sound. The real photoplay scripts seldom interests the person who cannot see pictures. It will appeal only to the man who can see in the bald run of action the pictures that will become real when the written action is translated into physical action. If you cannot see the action as you write it wait until you get through and then try to work it out into action. In time you'll find that you can raise up an image of the play at will and still later you'll be able to see the stuff play as you write it. Then you'll write for looks instead of sound and know what you are doing.

Inquiries.

NOTE—No questions can be replied to by mail. Look for your answers here. A list of addresses to which photoplays may be sent will be supplied on receipt of a STAMPED AND ADDRESSED ENVELOPE.

R. W. R.—The picture is not Miss Joyce. The next man, woman or child who cuts out and sends in an advertisement asking if it is Miss Joyce, is either going to be hurted or be responsible for the suicide of the Answers Man. Your second question is badly put. A photoplay is not rehearsed and then made. One scene is rehearsed, then taken, and a second put in rehearsal. It takes from three days to ten to make the average thousand-foot reel.

PARKSIDE AVENUE—Sign a name as a courtesy. It's no business of this department just what financial interest Mr. Edison has in any device.

R. J. S.—If you don't know who played the "Lady Leone," you don't deserve to class as a "fan." It was Miss Florence Lawrence. Thomas Dawson had the title role in "The Dandy." The young reporter in "All for a Girl," is cast as Mr. Fox. This may or may not be Earle Foxe. We lack the other casts. It is not easy to get the Universal casts now.

LOIS—We do not get Pathe casts, and Essanay no longer casts the Westerns. Miss Marie Weirman was Marie in "The Guiding Light." Peter Lang was her father. Bartley McCullum was the Village Blacksmith, Miss Weirman was Annie, and Charles Arthur, Herbert. In "The Vintage of Fate," Miss Betty Harte was Maria, Miss Phyllis Gordon was Helen, and Wheeler Oakman, Pietro. We noticed, and are correspondingly grateful.

W. M.—We do not get the Milano casts.

A. L.—We do not know Paul Kelly's age and we cannot discuss film merits with you.

M. K.—We do not know the nationality of Miss Lillian Christy. The American Western studio is in Santa Barbara.

F. L.—We do not get Western Essanay casts.

L. L.—John E. Brennan and Miss Ruth Roland had the parts you mention. If you've never seen Miss Roland before you are new to pictures. William Christie Miller and Miss Mary Pickford had the parts in "The Unwelcome Guest."

M. L.—The western establishment of the Selig Company is in Los Angeles.

J. J. McC.—There is as yet no well-defined rule in marking the scenes in a multiple reel script. Some companies number straight through, others number each part from one to the highest number. One company numbers the first in Arabic, letters the second, and writes the third in Roman numerals.

H. R. F.—Usually the synopses in this paper are prepared by the press department, though the author's synopsis may be copied if it is the proper length and style. Use the double space between scenes and between leaders and scenes. It makes for a better looking copy, that's all.

TRUCE—You are not "likely" to get a position with a photoplay company east, west, north or south unless you can show stage or picture experience. You are not even likely to get an answer unless you sign your name.

J. C.—A bust is any close-up view of a portion of a general scene, made large to emphasize some detail of the action. See "Technique of the Photoplay."

BESS—You are correct. The critic made the wrong identification.

WINNIE—We have not that Powers' cast. Miss Jean Darnell was the teacher in "The Truant's Doom."

Harbor Springs Replied To.

Mr. A. W. Ballenger, Dean Theater Company, York, Neb., contributes the following interesting letter:

> I have noticed the article of Manager Freeland, Harbor Springs, Mich., in the March 1st issue, and am rather surprised at the way he jumps on the manufacturers. It appears to me that the cause of the "hash" he speaks of with regard to films now being released is not entirely the manufacturer's fault. It strikes me that the cause of the releasing of so many films lies with the exhibitors themselves; not with the individual, but with them all. It is competition that necessitates the increased output—competition of exhibitors, I mean. Where there are houses in competition it is necessary that they do not show pictures which are shown in other houses in their city. Therein lies the demand, and if a manufacturer is unable to supply exhibitors he must get out of business. It is the same in any line. Competition compels the manufacturer to get his goods on the market at as early a date as possible, and he cannot give the attention to each individual piece that he would were there less demand. In regards to the multiple reel releases, it strikes me as a good idea to lengthen out a play—give it more action and more detail. If a subject is crowded into 1,000 feet it leaves much to be thought out by the audience. There must, of necessity, be a less number of and shorter titles. They must make action to suit the length, where if they had twice the time to produce the action they could put in a finer quality and make the story more plain to the audience. Again, if all manufacturers devoted more time to two and three-reel subjects there would be less demand for so many one-reel pictures. It is a well-known fact that "Monte Cristo" cannot receive justice in 1,000 feet, nor can the audience grasp the story and get the interest that should hold them through such a picture. Comedy, as shown in pictures today, would be better if it were filled out. It would get the audience twice as quick. There are innumerable comedies completely ruined simply because they are made too short, and that brings the audience back to the same old place. They must take time to reason out certain actions, and while they are doing this probably miss some of the best scenes; anyway they fail to get the idea the actor is trying to submit. I say, give them more space and longer stories and the moving picture business will advance much faster than it has. Encourage the manufacturer to make a better picture and see how quickly he will begin doing so. They want your money, and will give you value for it if you give them cause to think that you want a better quality and not so much quantity. Personally, I will be glad of the time when we show two, three and four-reel subjects almost exclusively. This I know: with proper projection, a multiple reel subject will make more friends for a house than any other picture that can be shown.

Brother Ballenger's letter is of much interest, but I think he is speaking of one thing, while Harbor Springs in his letter, and I in my comments, speak of another. In the first place, let us get right down to the root of this proposition and scratch around the foundation stone a little. The hieroglyphics on one side of that stone read: There are too many theaters. Now a word of explanation as to what I mean by this. We have a multiplicity of small theaters. A city of 10,000 population will have from three to four little theaters seating 200 or 300, instead of one seating from 500 to 1,000. In the very nature of things, the little fellow, playing to an audience of from 200 to 300, cannot afford to put up as good a show, in as good a way, as can the house seating 500 to 2,000. That is a plain matter of common sense which nobody, I think, will dispute. This multiplicity of theaters has also brought about the very evil of which brother Ballenger speaks. Each one of these theaters in that town of 10,000 wants from three to five reels a day, each one different from the other fellow's program, so that it may, in extreme cases, take as many as 25 reels a day to supply one town of 10,000 population, while if there be fifteen or twenty theaters in a city the demand for reels becomes even greater. Now, what I was talking about, and what Harbor Springs wrote about, was not, as I understand it, so much the two, three and four-reel releases. What Harbor Springs was hitting at was the padding out of a little, slow, one-horse story, that could be entirely told in 500 feet, to 1,000 feet. I fully realize that there is truth in what you say concerning the length of really meritous stories. You can cut down too much as well as pad out too much. But the evil of it all lies in the fact, as I said in my reply to Harbor Springs, the turning out of 100 (it is about 112 now) reels a week simply means that everything worth while will have been done, done, done and done over again before the business is 25 years old. It is a big question and I would like to hear from exhibitors and operators on this subject. It is a question which vitally concerns the future of the business. As to the multiple reel release, I long ago prophesied that it is only a question of time when we would have the regular plays put on in moving pictures, to last from 8:30 to 11, or 2½ hours, which would mean from ten to fifteen reels to the subject. These plays will be put on by the best actors the world can produce, and the small town theater patron, instead of paying 35 to 50 cents to see a splendid play butchered by a troupe of barnstormers, will pay the same sum to see it put on in photoplay by the world's greatest artists.

A Fine Plant.

> Our operating room is 12 x 8 feet, 6 feet in the clear. We project a 13-foot picture at 98 feet, using two Motiograph machines of late model. We have two meters and two sets of No. 4 wires feeding the operating room circuits. One machine is a combination M. P. and dissolver. We use a compensarc for each machine and a rheostat for the top dissolver lamp. The room has a vent flue 12 x 14 inches, which is the largest possible under the circumstances, there being living apartments over the theater. The operating room has running water, 'phone service and steam heat, the latter being used only when we are working in the operating room during off hours. We use two Gundlach half-size lenses, and in this connection I desire to say something. For months I have at times noticed an effect on the screen similar to the travel ghost caused by the shutter being out of time, but testing the shutter I found it to be O. K. I discovered the trouble was that oil had spattered on the lens a little and produced the above effect. We clean our lenses daily, but have to watch them during the show, and if travel ghost starts we get busy and clean the lens; also, if the picture starts to flicker we either change lugs and cut off some of the feed wire or tighten connections, and the flicker disappears.

You are indeed fortunate to have such an excellent operating room, brother Stevens. I notice that everything is neat, clean and in order therein, which speaks well for the operator. Cannot you get two of those vent flues? One of that size is not large enough should you have a fire. I would also suggest that you hang your wall shutters as directed in the new handbook. As to the oil spattering, this is due to the use of (a) too thin an oil; (b) too much of it. Lay two pieces of blotting paper in the inside of your mechanism and it will absorb the oil, so that you can keep the inside of the head clean by merely changing the paper.

A Camera Man's Qualifications.

Hartford, Wis., wants to know if a cameraman has to be a qualified photographer, and if a motion picture operator would stand any chance of securing such a position.

No; there would be no chance for an operator—in fact, an experience as operator would be of very little value to him as cameraman. The cameraman has to be an expert judge of light and other things.

Announcement Slide Coating.

Mr. J. Corcoran, Charleston, Ill., writes:

> I feel due to say something in the department. Our little city has 7,000 people and two moving picture theaters doing a good business. I am both manager and operator in my own house, and have a Pathe Professional projector, which has been in service three years without developing any trouble of any kind. A good slide coating is made by mixing a little ordinary alabastine with water. It dries in a minute, may be written on with an ordinary pen, and will neither rub nor burn off, but washes off readily.

The alabastine slide coating idea is passed along for consideration. Many thanks for its contribution.

On the Board Walk.

Mr. W. Long, Atlantic City, N. J., writes:

> Things are jogging along in the same old way in Atlantic City, except that the men have organized in the I. B. E. W., Local Union No. 271. I hand you herewith a picture of all the Atlantic City operators. President, C. R. Lester; vice-president, Wm. Long; financial secretary, T. L. Truitt; recording secretary, Wm. Hallworth; treasurer, H. Branbusy; business agent, B. French. I have an answer to that picture-quivering puzzle in February 22nd issue, but first I want to see what the other fellows have to say. You will hear from me again shortly.

Glad to form the pictorial acquaintance of the Atlantic City boys. Maybe I will take a run down there next summer, now that I know you all. Will be glad to have your solution of the quivering effect, at your convenience.

Removing Emulsion.

New York City inquires as to what is the best method of removing emulsion. Also encloses a sketch of a rewinder, asking my opinion. As to removing emulsion, you will find direction for that in the handbook. As to the rewinder, I do not understand why you should make a rewind with everything except the gears and one brass collar of wood. What is the idea, brother?

From Colorado Springs.

Mr. O. C. Hurt, Colorado Springs, Colo., makes his debut in the department as follows:

> I would not be without the World under any consideration. Have been operating between five and six years, and am still learning something every day. Our theater, the Princess, is the show place of the city. Seating capacity is 1,006, including a small balcony. Operating room equipment consists of Power's 6-A projector and Enterprise dissolving stereo. Our picture is 14 feet at 108-foot throw. We have a gold fibre screen, and a motor generator set for the arc circuit. Use 30 to 60-day service, four reels a day except Monday, which is feature day. Our operating room is 12 x 12 feet, with a 24-inch vent pipe. It is made of steel beams and concrete. The machines are bolted through the floor, which is 7¼ inches thick. We have two big slate switchboards carrying the voltmeter, ammeter and field rheostat, as well as the various switches. In closing I want to say that my wife is some operator herself. She can make some of the fellows sit up and take notice when it comes to putting on a really good picture. Will send you a picture of our operating room before long.

That is just like a letter from home, brother Hurt. I have paraded up a book. Hope I may have the pleasure of visiting it again some day.

Well I Don't Know.

Mr. F. E. Howard, Elma, Iowa, is running a theater in that little city, using three reels of Universal program per night. Says he is of a scientific turn of mind and has been greatly interested in Kinematography since its early development. Has been studying the practical as well as the theoretical features of the science of projection, and has conceived an idea concerning it. He writes:

> I have conceived an idea for the elimination of flicker, that, so far as I have been able to learn, has not been tried out. Now you may smile and double your bet of 37 cents, but just the same I might have the last laugh after all. As you know, the efforts to eliminate flicker mechanically speaking, have been along the line of heightening the "illusion." That is to say, inventors have striven to improve the light, lenses, intermittent movement and the shutter, the latter having been developed from a one to a three-wing affair. All this for the purpose of better deception to the eye, all the while relying on "persistance of vision" to tide over the intervals of darkness on the screen. My idea concerns none of these. It involves no mechanical principle, but has to do with chemistry of light as well as optics. But the practical working out of the idea so as to attain the greatest perfection in the shortest possible time would require the resources of an experimental laboratory, like Edison's for instance. Would you advise me to submit the idea to Mr. Edison and trust to his treating me fairly in a financial way if the idea proves as successful as I anticipate? Would you care to have the idea explained to you in confidence, that you might pass upon its feasibility?

While I have no doubt but that Mr. Edison would treat you with perfect fairness, so far as he himself is personally concerned, yet, for your own peace of mind, I would advise you to have your idea patented before submitting it to any manufacturer. I can examine the thing in confidence if you so desire, but not being up on the chemical end my opinion would probably have small value. Frankly, I think I would be willing to risk fully 74 cents against you. If you have sufficient confidence in the idea to go to the expense of a patent, you may, after securing the same, forward the thing to me, and if it looks feasible, I will see what I can do to secure consideration for it from manufacturers.

Atlantic City.

> February 1st issue, under caption, "Bausch & Lomb to Blame?" the writer sets forth his idea of the deplorable conditions in this city. Well, yes, the conditions are bad in some ways; that is true. However, all the old-time operators of this city have been asked concerning this article, and denied its authorship. We do not call a man who has only been in the business three or four years an old-timer. Do you? Now, if you want to know more about the conditions here, let us know. We are positive that the managers of this city desire the best projection and the best machines they can get. You remember my letter, "Ancient History," in the department, March 4th, 1911, issue. Ask the writer of that article to look it up and read it. I have followed your work closer than you think, since your first articles in the World, "Plain Talks to Managers and Operators." I find you to be just the kind of a man who was wanted to whip some of the ones into line who have busted into the business and learned it in a few months, and give them some idea of how little they really do know. I have been in the business since '96 and have not learned it yet. I only hope you will continue the good work, and I can assure you that you have the confidence of all good operators—those who want to make good. I wish to divide the credit for this letter with Mr. Harry S. Bransby, another really old-timer.

Mr. Reed is the man who went out with "Pop" Rock or, more properly speaking, with the firm of Wainwright & Rock, and opened what was the first 10-cent moving picture theater in this country, at 326 Canal Street, New Orleans, La., July 28th, 1896. The first public exhibition of motion picture projection on a screen having taken place on April 23rd, 1896, in New York City. Brother Reed can therefore be rightly termed the dean of all motion picture operators, in America at least. He has been, as I understand it, in the game ever since. As to Atlantic City, I do not myself remember who wrote the letter in question, and it would be a great deal of trouble to hunt it up. I have just established an office downtown, purchased letter files, and propose to keep the department correspondence on file in such shape that I can refer to letters hereafter without so much trouble. I shall indeed be glad to hear from brother Reed as to the conditions in Atlantic City.

An Argument.

Lake Geneva, Wis., writes:

> Would you be kind enough to settle an argument? A says that in the taking of a moving picture the camera lens is open for the same length of time it is closed—that is to say, if the camera is working at the rate of 16 pictures per second the lens would be open at the total of 1/32 of a second and closed the same length of time for the taking of each separate picture. B contends the lens is open an infinitesimal part of a second—that it is only open about 1/250 of a second for each picture. Who is right? As this is of no general interest to operators, I enclose a stamped envelope for reply, and thank you very, very much.

As often as I have told our correspondents that inquiries will not be replied to by mail except a minimum fee of $1 be enclosed, there is still an average of one-half dozen requests a day for mail replies. If I made a practice of replying by mail without a fee this would quickly amount to from 30 to 50 letters a day. I would like to write to all of you personally, but I simply cannot do it. As to the argument, B is correct. By looking on page 570, February 8th issue, you will find the camera shutter speed given by some correspondent.

Picture Out-of-Focus.

Toledo, Ohio, writes:

> Have an Edison Exhibition Model Projector which has been run about five years and has given good service. The picture is out-of-focus on one side. There is a quarter of an inch play in the shutter, and I say this is the cause. Am I right?

The shutter having play would cause a travel ghost, which might produce an out-of-focus effect, especially if constant and slight. I cannot say with certainty what your trouble is, but I would suggest that if you have been using that machine five years you had better get a new, up-to-date projection mechanism.

A New Rewinder.

Mr. Bazil Gilmer, operator at Royal Theater, Gatesville, Texas, has invented what he says is a perfect rewinder for all projectors. I have had so many tell me this same thing that brother Gilmer will have to show me. Send in a model of your invention, brother, and if it is what you claim, I will be only too pleased to set the matter forth at length in the department.

Good Projection Wins.

Mr. R. W. Rhea, Palacios, Texas, writes:

> Am operating in a small town and it is only through good projection we are able to exist. Ten shows in succession failed before we entered the field. Most likely the operators who preceded me did not read the department or keep the handbook on tap. In adjusting carbons I always use the reflection on the outside shutter and I find it a success. It works the same as a pin hole punched in the lamphouse, the lens taking the place of the pinhole. Of course, you can only use this while the machine is in motion. By the way, Mr. Bug behaved scandalously in one of the titles I ran last night.

Good projection will win anywhere, as against the other kind. I think I would prefer the pin-hole myself, though your scheme can be used all right.

What Would Happen.

Mr. George S. Steidel of Steidel & Pugh Ideal Theater, Pottsville, Pa., asks:

> Will you kindly give me your opinion as to the following: If 2,000 feet of film caught fire and burned to ashes in a lower magazine in a Power's 6A Cameragraph, what would the damage have been to the head of the machine?

If 2,000 feet of film burned to ashes in the lower magazine of the Power's 6A, or any other mechanism, the machine itself would not be worth to exceed sixteen and two-thirds cents. In other words it would be ruined. There is a possibility that with a very tightly wound film the thing might smolder; that is to say; burn slowly and gradually char, without any large amount of blaze escaping from the magazine, assuming, of course, that the magazine door is closed and that it is not forced open by the gases or entirely destroyed by the heat. In this event the mechanism itself might not be very badly damaged, but I hardly think such a thing is possible. My opinion in the matter is that the machine would be ruined absolutely and totally. The gears and possibly the frame itself might be melted, or at least warped clear out of shape.

Dark, Deep, Dense Mystery.

Mr. Henry Lacy, Cincinnati, Ohio, comes across with the following:

> In Feb. 15th issue we read that Cincinnati is the proud possessor of a lady operator, but up to date cannot locate the four bunches of grapes containing the exit lights, as per description. She must perform outside the city, because we have no lady license holder. Our sympathies go out to poor Muriel. Why doesn't the other partner take the main work, or maybe he is born t-i-r-e-d and supports the suffragist movement as an easy way out?

They tell me that since the publication of that article, Cincinnati operators have been haunting the highways and by-ways with a dark lantern in one hand and a spy glass in the other, looking, longing and seeking for Muriel and the four bunches of grapes. Never mind, old man, I will not give the snap away (I am talking to the husband now, gentlemen). I would, however, suggest that you send four bunches of grapes up to the next meeting of the Cincinnati Operators' Union by messenger, with the compliments of Muriel.

It's a Fine Scheme.

Mr. W. F. Van Allen, New York State, requests that the name of the town be not given and writes:

> February 19 I opened as fine a little theater as you will find any time in a town of two thousand. Some scheme that, on page 86, March first issue (Brother Van Allen refers to the farmer-ticket advertising scheme. Ed.). I had no sooner read it than I got busy. Fifty cents each was about the limit with the merchants, but I tied them up to try it for four weeks, and then had 600 tickets like the attached printed. I supply the merchants with these tickets and collect Monday. Last Saturday was the first day and I had as fine a class of people as one would wish. The theater was comfortably filled; besides I had more paid admissions than on the previous Saturday, because they brought their town friends with them and they, of course, paid. Our local editor gave me a splendid write-up on the scheme, without cost, after which I paid ten cents per inch each week. It did not hurt my Saturday night business at all, and many farmers live on the trolley line, too.

Comment is unnecessary. Undoubtedly the scheme is a good one in small towns located in rural communities. I recommended the plan at the time, and still recommend it.

Measuring Condensers.

South Dakota orders a handbook and says:

> The book must be a "scream" if it is anything like the Moving Picture World. I am just starting up here and am installing a Fairbanks-Morse 6 H. P. engine and a 3½ k. w. generator, 110 volts. Have a Power's 5 machine with a 40 foot throw. Am unable to get a good stereo picture, though the M. P. is all right. Use about 30 amperes; ⅝ cored carbons and No. 6 wires. The condenser nearest the light is 6½. Do not know what the other one is. How can I measure it? I know I am not displaying much knowledge, but am trying to be honest and learn.

Only the fool fears to display lack of knowledge. The wise man asks questions and acquires knowledge. You will find method of measuring condensing lenses described on page 356 of the handbook. While you have not said what width your picture is, it pretty near a cinch you need two 6½ lenses on that short throw.

Slide Coating.

Mr. Amas F. Towne, Soldiers' Home, Washington, D. C., writes:

> The best opaque slide coating I have found is Indian Red mixed with vinegar to the thickness of cream. Apply this to the glass with a soft brush. It works fine.

Many thanks for the formula, Brother Towne. It is passed along to the department fans for experiment.

International Union Policy.

Mr. Oscar B. Bridges, corresponding secretary Local Union No. 521, I. A. T. S. E., Palestine, Texas, writes:

> The members of this union are constant readers of the World, particularly the department. We were surprised to read your reply to the Gem Theater manager's letter in a recent issue. We had already taken the matter up with our International President Shay, and his ruling is that no house is considered fair unless a member of the I. A. T. S. E. is employed therein, and at no time is a manager to be permitted to run his own machine; also that the union operator is to have full control of his operating room. Please give this matter consideration and take it up with President Shay, as you know the biggest part of your circulation is among union operators. I send you a list of our officers for the directory.

I have already had this matter up with the International President, brother Bridges, and while, as a member of the organization, I must bow to his decisions, as editor of this department it is my duty to take issue even with him, or with the organization itself, when I think it is in the wrong. This is not said in a spirit of egotism. The man who has not the courage of his convictions and will allow his own material interest to stand in the way of telling the truth, and standing for what he believes to be the right, is not a man fitted to hold the position of editor, or to speak with authority on any subject. It now becomes my duty to set forth the proposition fully and clearly as I see it. As applied to Palestine, where there are competing houses, and where there is a local union of operators, the decision of brother Shay is perfectly right, because if one theater in such a city can afford to employ a union operator, the rest can also afford to do it, or else they ought to all go out of business. This is not said with the idea of stamping on anyone's toes, nor is it aimed at any individual, but simply stated as a broad proposition. I will back up brother Shay in his ruling as applied to cities large enough to have a local union, or in cities having competing houses and lying within the jurisdiction of another local. I think in these cases it is only fair, just and right that the manager should attend to his job of managing and employ a competent operator to attend to the operating. Also such a course is for the best interest of the business in general and it insures fair competition among the managers themselves, so far as the projection end of things be concerned.

But there is another proposition also included in brother Shay's ruling wherein I cannot altogether agree with him, and that is this: There are many hundreds of villages barely able to support a small theater, perhaps only running two or three nights a week, but where the support absolutely is not sufficient to permit of the employment of an operator at anything like a union scale, or perhaps even at any scale at all. Such houses often can only exist as a family affair. Most likely the manager is also the operator, janitor and billposter, his daughter or wife the pianist; another daughter the ticket seller, and perhaps a son the door tender. On this basis these village "theaters" manage to exist, and there are more of them that you think there are, too. They furnish the little hamlets with a clean, healthy form of amusement, and it would be entirely wrong and absolutely unfair, from any and every point of view, to force them to employ a union or any other kind of an operator. The writer is, as you all well know, heartily in favor of organization, but he believes that union labor must proceed along sane and common sense lines. Just exactly how this particular proposition can be handled I do not know, but I most certainly want to see the matter brought before the next convention and some line of procedure adopted which will be fair and just to every one concerned, provided such a plan can be evolved. I well know the thing is not as simple as it looks, and its satisfactory solution will be very difficult.

After the reply to Palestine referred to in brother Bridges' letter was in print I saw that I had not put things exactly the way I intended to. We all make mistakes sometimes, and I placed myself a little bit wrong that time. I trust that I have now made my position in this matter clear, and I believe that all fair-minded men will agree with me that my position is not far from being right. I believe that even brother Shay will, upon mature deliberation, not say that I am wrong, though from motives of general policy he might be inclined to oppose me. I should be glad to hear from some of our union contributors on this point. I must correct you in one thing, however, brother. While we have a very large number of union readers, still the paper reaches practically all the operators in the country, and as yet but a comparatively small percentage of them are organized. The list of officers appeared last week.

Fireproof Operating Room.

Mr. Charles F. Bode, manager Pass-Time Theater, Alexandria, La., writes:

> Enclosed find the last number of my weekly program, which may interest your friend Mr. E. W. Sargent. Also enclose a clipping from a former number, which explains itself. While the construction of my operating room does not come up to your specification, I was so confident of its safety that I was willing to risk a public demonstration. My dependence on safety was an 18 x 18 inch ventilating flue and asbestos lining. Half of the film was unwound on top of the balance in middle of floor. After lighting, the chief and I remained in the room some little time, and could have stayed to the end, as draft from door behind us took heat gases and smoke right up flue. But we wanted to see the shutters in operation, so stepped out and shut the door, which action also closed shutters.

Your vent flue is very nearly up to my specifications, brother Bode. I suggest 288 square inches (two square feet) as a minimum, whereas yours is 226 square inches. If it carries away the smoke from a burning film that is all that is necessary. It is ample. But my whole scheme hinges on not letting the audience know there is a fire. Experience has taught us time and again that once let an audience catch sight of the smoke and some crazy individual will yell "Fire! Get out for your lives!" and then you cannot stop that audience from killing each other any more than you could stop a stampede of long-horned Texas steers. It will cost you practically nothing to arrange your shutters as I have instructed in the handbook. I would advise you by all means to do it. But, in this connection, I am going to suggest that the master cord be made of No. 22 copper wire, which will have no stretch to it, and that, instead of the harness rings, pulleys 2 inches in diameter be used, and that where the cord goes across the spreaders over the aperture and film box a piece of film 6 or 8 inches long be used, the master cord (wire) being attached to the film by means of a clamp at either end. This, if properly done, will absolutely insure the almost instantaneous closing of the shutters when a fire starts, as the film will burn in two instantly. The only trouble is that it would take two men to open the shutters. But that is only done once a day. If necessary I will make a drawing of the idea, but I think you will all understand what I mean. The trouble with your present scheme is, as I understand it, by the time you get these wall shutters closed the audience would have caught sight of the smoke, and if that happens, good night! Your program has been forwarded to brother Sargent.

Engine Trouble.

Mr. Harry Waldron, proprietor Langdon and Electric Theaters, Langdon, N. Dak., writes:

> I am now able to give some facts about low-voltage generators. I purchased a 1.8-k.w., 60-volt, d. c. Fairbanks-Morse generator delivering 30 amperes, about six weeks ago, and belted it to a 3-h.p. kerosene engine, intending to play a circuit of towns once each week, using a twin cable to carry the current into the hall in which I showed. I knew that a 3-h.p. engine was too light, but they claimed 4 for it. In service I found that it produced voltage sufficient to light the incandescents to c.p., but when the arc was struck the speed was reduced so much that the incandescents only burned red. Moral: It pays to have plenty of reserve power. The engine was very hard to start in cold weather, and for this reason the show was often delayed. Another objection was that it took at least four men to handle the engine in shipping. I am now having the dynamo driven by a local engine in each town, and this is proving satisfactory, except on account of the distance I sometimes have to carry the current. I have conveyed it as much as 500 feet on a No. 10 wire, with some drop in voltage, making it necessary to raise the dynamo pressure above normal. Recently I blew a 50-ampere fuse with a 30-ampere generator, owing to having cut out all resistance that night. The wiring I use I have put up permanently on poles, and it is now only necessary to set up a dynamo and connect. My experience has proven to me that 60 volts is O. K. for house installation, but rather low for any distance from the theater. If buying again I would select a 2½-k.w., 70-volt generator. The one I have is a compound wound and very steady and efficient, provided the speed be maintained steadily. The voltage is uniform at full and no load. The engine was a 3-h.p. Falk, which throttled and ran quite steadily when not overloaded. Barring the trouble in starting, it was not a bad engine, but a kerosene engine needs to get real hot before giving results. I believe that a kerosene engine which drew its mixture through a chamber heated by the exhaust pipe would run very smoothly. I am still digesting the new handbook, reading every word and studying out the diagrams until I understand them thoroughly. I believe that you can improve upon the definition of electricity by simply saying that "electricity is energy." I have devised a file for the varied information in the department. I use a good-sized flexible memorandum book, heading the different pages "Lens," "Motor Drive," "Screen," "Resistance," etc., and then skimming through the entire bound volume for the sense of each letter, and then indexing it in the book accordingly. When I desire information on a given subject I just turn to a page which will indicate dozens of articles on that subject and your comments on same. I shall make such a file of the advertising department. I wish to say a good word for the Gundlach Manhattan lens. A made-to-order lens increased the sharpness of my picture wonderfully.

Brother Waldron, if you could spare that index book of yours for a week or two I certainly would appreciate it if you would send same to me by express, so that I can make a copy. It would save me a world of work, as I have been intending to do that same thing myself, but never can get the time. I will return the book promptly. As to the engine matter, I would recommend the makers of kerosene engines to take particular note of what you have said. I thoroughly agree with you that ample reserve power is absolutely essential to good results. I think you are wrong in using No. 10 wire. It would pay you better, anyhow, to use No. 8. Your letter is interesting. Many thanks for its contribution.

Got Pinched.

Mr. Leo King, Hot Springs, Ark., orders a new handbook and says:

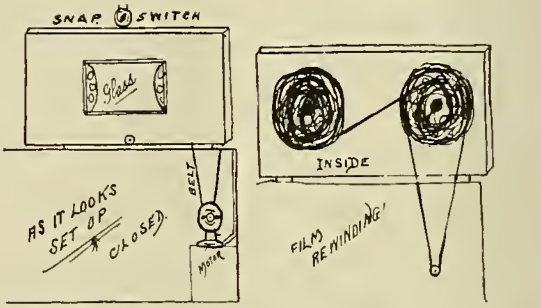
> I have one of the old vest pocket handbooks you put out years ago; also one of the first edition. They are chock full of good dope, but not nearly as full as the new book, if all I hear is true. The Hot Springs theaters have been closed Sundays for two years past, but for the last two weeks have been fighting the city and county officials. We only got pinched eight times last Sunday. They allow the gambling houses, cigarette stores and fruit stands to open, but the picture show? Horrors! Shut them up! The managers are getting tired of this and decided to either compel everything to close or open their own doors.

With all that pinching I should think brother King would be pretty sore. What a ridiculous, idiotic and utterly asinine proposition it is after all—those highly moral and uplifting institutions, the gambling house and dealer in cigarettes, allowed to run wide open Sundays, and the moving picture theaters kept tightly closed. I should think the Hot Springs officials, to say nothing of the church people, must have lost all their sense of the ridiculous. They must indeed have queer ideas as to what constitutes the eternal fitness of things and be the proud possessors of the highly perverted sense of right and wrong. A moving picture theater classed below a gambling house. Fine! The next thing we know Hot Springs will be moving its underworld out on Main Street and closing up its Sunday schools.

Out-of-Focus Trouble.

Lloyd G. Balkam, Washington, D. C., writes as follows:

> Have been operating since 1910. I have a peculiar trouble which I am unable to account for or remedy, viz: double edge on the right side of my picture. When I focus up without a film in, the aperture edges are sharp all around, but when the film is in there is a double edge on the right side of the screen. I use a Power's Six projector on 105 foot throw. Tried a new aperture plate, but the trouble showed up just the same. I attach hereto sketch of rewinder, approved for use in this city. It is made by Mr. N. C. Darby, is patented by him and is approved for use by the Washington Fire Department. I would suggest that the independent film producers be interviewed with regard to their patches, which certainly are the limit. Their first run releases are full of mis-prints, mis-frames and patches badly made. The Gem, Imp, Mecca, Powers, Punch and Victor are the worst offenders and, as you know, the poor operator gets the blame when compelled to stop the machine by reason of these faults. I would also like to inquire why so many of the Bison 101 films are blurred in the center. Will send you photo of operating room soon.



Rewinder made by N. C. Darby, of Washington, O. C., also patented by him. Approved for use by fire department of this city.

As regard the double edge proposition, are you sure there is not a faint finger mark or a small spot of oil on your lens? See that your tension shoe bears evenly on the aperture plate track and that it sets square with the tracks. Try loosening the aperture and blocking one side out just a little with a piece of tin. Be sure your lenses and aperture are in line throughout (See handbook, page 227). As to the Independent Film faults, I have taken the matter up with the Universal people, requesting them to look into it. Possibly some good may be accomplished in this way. Don't know about the Bison 101 fault. First I had heard of it.

Nothing Doing.

Coden, Ala., writes:

> I have purchased new equipment, consisting of Power's 6-A and a Perfecto gas-making outfit with a 70 mm, e.f. projection lens, but I am unable to produce a picture in distance over 5 feet. I am inexperienced with this light.

Well, Coden, I don't know what to say. A 70 mm, e.f. lens would be a 2¾-inch e.f., which is a very, very wide angle lens indeed, and I should think not at all suitable to your purpose. Seems to me that a 3½-inch e.f. lens would be plenty short. As to the Perfecto gas-making outfit, I cannot help you, as I know nothing about that particular brand of gas producer. I would suggest that you take the matter up with its manufacturer.

Injuring Definition.

Springfield, Mo., says:

> An operator acquaintance of mine claims that the outside shutter injures the definition of the picture. Is there anything in this?

There is not.

"THE GIFT OF THE STORM" (Lubin), March 28.—There seems to be an old-time. and we don't mean old-fashioned, quality about this picture by Emmett C. Hall, and it seemed to take with the audience strongly. It is a romance with some poetry, a convincing simplicity and also that indescribable touch of personality that has made Arthur Johnson probably the most popular player on the screen. The story is fresh enough, but not new. In it an actress who is lost in the woods is forced by a blizzard to spend a day or so in the cabin of a queer, lonely farmer. The players are Arthur Johnson, Lottie Briscoe and Howard Mitchell. The plot is clear, sensible and well-knit. The photography is of good quality.

"SALLY IN OUR ALLEY" (Selig), March 28.—This picture was suggested by the old and still popular ballad which it illustrates and will be helped much by the music. The authoress, H. G. Baker, has kept her scenario simple and concrete, which makes it effective and the producer, Colin Campbell, in his scenes and acting (if we leave out the two street scenes that are like afternoon teas) has given it just about the right touch. It makes an offering that we can commend heartily, a little lyric photoplay with the proper music. The photography is very good. Wheeler Oakman is the apprentice of the draper, Thomas Santschi, who loves "Sally," Bessie Eyton.

"THE HERO-COWARD" (Essanay), March 28.—A story of a man who is afraid of horses only, and, unfortunately, has a job on the police force. The character is not new in pictures and not very common in life and is not a hard character to make up a story for, since the plot must always be the same in outline, if not in incident. In every case the half-coward has been disgraced and then has rehabilitated himself by showing that he is no coward after all. It is clearly pictured in this film and seemed to give entertainment to the audience. The lead is taken by E. H. Calvert. W. Bailey, W. Walters and Helen Dunbar also have roles.

"A WAY TO THE UNDERWORLD" (Edison), March 28.—Another of the "What Happened to Mary" series.. It will not stand very well by itself and is most melodramatic, indeed, we are a bit astonished at its quality, seeing it among Edison releases. There was not much inattention while it was on and so far as we could see the greater part of the audience found entertainment in it.

"CRABS AND LOBSTERS" (Pathe), March 28.—Well photographed studies in an aquarium. It shows us the "goat" and the "spider" crabs and others, and we see a few lobsters crawling about.

"THE TOBACCO CULTURE IN CUBA" (Pathe), March 28.—This offering is full of information and is very interesting. The photography is clear and the process of growing our "smoking" and our "chewing" is fully illustrated. A more acceptable topical offering than most.

"SCENES IN JAPAN" (Vitagraph), March 28.—A short filling-out piece that is of very little value.

"BUNNY BLARNEYED" (Vitagraph), March 28.—A pleasing offering, it gives us a love comedy that is lighthearted and laughable enough. Bunny has the lead as a stern parent who, after kissing the Blarneystone at the castle, needs help but can't get it until he gives consent to a marriage. The picture's views of the ruined castle and the Irish country around it are fine in every way. Larry Trimble plainly worked it up to be played in Blarney Castle and has made a very fair offering of it.

"THE CHATEAU OF CHAMBORD" (Pathe), March 27.—A number of views of this famous chateau, built by Francis I, in whose reign the Renaissance flowered in France. The building is worth seeing. but so much of it merely as a specimen, and so little of it as a historic home is a bit wearisome. It wasn't long, but several in the audience got tired of it.

"THE FIRED COOK" (Kalem), March 28.—A farce in which Marshall Neilan and Ruth Roland play a young couple who employ a new cook, John Brennan, a man dressed as a woman. It made the audience laugh.

"THE CAT AND THE BONNET" (Kalem), March 28.—By the same players as the above, this farce has not quite so much action, yet it, too, made laughter.

"THE MOONSHINER'S LAST STAND" (Patheplay), March 26.—This two-reel special is a true feature and supplies the demand for red-blood action. From the first, the story is wide-awake, although when we see the sheriff and the revenue man coming to blows on account of the girl, the hold weakens for a moment; for it doesn't convince. But we are now given a shiver of horror. A snake coils around the feet of the heroine (the house was filled with shudders). And following this, comes the sharpest kind of action up to the climax in which the illicit whiskey distillers, with the sheriff who has brought the snake-bitten girl back to the cabin, are besieged by the drunken Indians. The sheriff has to creep out and get the cavalry. In the end, after the moonshiners are rescued from the now burning cabin by the troops, it is found that the evidence against them has been destroyed. The brave moonshiner has won the sympathy of the spectators and it may be assumed, in a picture, the right to go free. Octavia Handworth plays the girl and it was plain that she pleased the audience. Crane Wilbur plays the revenue man. The photography is very good.

"GETTING UP A PRACTICE" (Vitagraph), March 27.—A little comedy in which a young medical man's chums make the community think him a desirable physician. Now, a doctor can't advertise directly, and in this case there is a love story at stake, so his three friends take indirect ways of making him known. We can say with assurance that it amused the audience. Marguerite Bertasch deserves credit for writing up a fresh corner of experience. Its producers, M. Costello and W. Ranous, have made a sensible, laugh-making picture of it. The doctor is played by Mr. Costello; the girl, by Clara Young; her objecting father, by Mr. Ranous, and the doctor's three friends by Hughie Mack, George Cooper and James Morrison, all of whom helped a good deal..

"THE FOOD CHOPPER WAR" (Selig), March 27.—A farcical love story in which the son and daughter of rival grocers elope and then conspire against their respective fathers, and so corner the town's supply of food choppers. There was more laughter in the early scenes than later, for it is too long and has a good deal of repetition. There is much that is artificial in it.

"THE TRAIL OF THE ITCHING PALM" (Essanay), March 27.—The audience seemed to find this farce, or most of it, very entertaining, and there was considerable laughter. It gives us a picture of the tipping evil and entertains us with the experiences of Pop Brown (Joseph Allen), who has joined T. Wad's Anti-Tipping Association. In the first place, John Steppling was in love with his daughter, Beverly Bayne, but he refused to let him have her because he tips servants and shows that he doesn't know how to take care of his money. Pop manages to "bunco himself" until John has to come to the rescue. The way he does it is good fun.

"MEMORIES OF HIS YOUTH" (Lubin), March 27.—We have a good, wholesome situation in this picture, produced by Barry O'Neil from a script of Clara Broabger which may be original, but is not new, being very close, indeed, to a story of F. Hopkinson Smith's. It is a well-acted and clearly presented offering and evidently pleased the audience, who watched it closely. The story deals with an artist who had loved, but lost, a woman in his youth, and who meets her son, a broker. Later the young man is tempted to do a dishonest act, but the influence of the artist keeps him straight, and then there is a happy ending, in which the young man wins his sweetheart. Charles Arthur is the broker, and Marie Weirman is the girl. Harry Meyers is the artist.

"THE SHERIFF'S REWARD" (Patheplay), March 27.—An offering with enough action to keep the interest awake, but in which, aside from its scenes and general arrangement, there is nothing new. In all these pictures the reward of the sheriff is the girl, married in the early scenes to a bad man who is killed in the end. There are some interesting railroad scenes in which the outlaw is trying to get away on a flat car and is chased by the sheriff on the cowcatcher of another engine. The slowness of the camera (to make speedy action) results in some noticeable awkwardness.

"THE OLD GRAY MARE" (Biograph), March 27.—Some friends of a drunken man's wife ring many changes on the old nag waiting outside of a saloon, and make the man think it time to swear off. It is an offering meant to make laughter, and did so.

"ALL HAIL TO THE KING" (Biograph), March 27.—A dream burlesque, given as the experience of a tramp asleep on a bench. It certainly made the audience laugh.

"HINEMOA" (Melies), March 27.—A very pretty, poetic picture, giving a primitive love story in a natural and quite convincing way. There is nothing theatrical about it at all. It was taken in New Zealand, and partly on the island of Mokoia, and for the most part the players are genuine Maori people. One will find in these folklore stories a quality something like stories in Homer. A Maori girl loves a warrior and finds a way to make him win her, in spite of her father. It is beautiful and delightful and we can find nothing but good to say of it.

"LOVE LAUGHS AT LOCKSMITHS" (Vitagraph), March 26.—There is not a great deal that is new or truly fresh in this picture of a boarding school love story, and the agreeableness of the players alone keeps it from falling flat. Anna Stewart, who plays the heroine, is very pretty and seems to be new in pictures, but she is not yet a great actress. Frank Bennett plays her lover, and Frank Currier, her objecting father who sends the girl away to the school, kept by Flora Finch, the inimitable. Charles Eldridge has a small role as one of the school's professors, and there are a number of girls. The audience found it amusing.

"THE UNPROFITABLE BOARDER" (Edison), March 26.—A farce with burlesque characters for the most part. The audience found its good parts very amusing, but it is too long, the first half being rather inane. It has a real comedy situation as soon as it becomes known that the impecunious boarder, with an imaginary rich uncle (a first-class item), has taken up his abode in a farmhouse where his former city landlady is aunt. This part of the farce is worthy of the film it uses and is most entertaining. It was written by Herbert Prior, who plays the leading role, and was produced by C. J. Williams. Alice Washburn, William Wadsworth, Mabel Trunnelle and Mrs. Williams also have good roles and acquit themselves well. The photography is only so-so.

"THE GATE SHE LEFT OPEN" (Patheplay), March 26.—Perhaps of all pictures among regular releases today this shows the most careful handling on the producer's part. It has the best photography and is the most smoothly conducted, but the scenario is too conventional to make a deeply interesting offering. It tells a duplicate love story, wholesome and pleasing and with an optimistic outlook on life. Nephew and niece love each other; then a lost letter is found, and uncle and aunt are reconciled. The players are agreeable personally, but there is nothing great in their work. The sets and backgrounds are just what was needed. The audience watched it closely and seemed entertained.

"THE SCRATCH" (Essanay), March 26.—An interesting comedy with a pleasing freshness, and in which there seems to be more good picture matter than in any other of today's releases. The story develops at a house party, where an incident that many a nervous guest has feared (a man getting into a girl's room by mistake) causes commotion for a while, but in the morning is explained in a way that adds a pleasing touch to the picture and one that will go far toward making it popular. The offering is a little slow at first, but wakes up after the first few scenes. The incident is brought out naturally and is very acceptably acted. The awkward guest is Augustus Carney. Joseph Allen, Lillian Drew, Ruth Hennessy and Frances Mason also have roles. The audience seemed to take pleasure in it.

"THE FACE AT THE WINDOW" (Kalem), March 26.—The first few scenes are a bit wearisome, because it cannot be seen that they are aiming at any particular story, but toward the end it does present a definite situation that holds. The interest in this comes from the way it is carried out, not from the incident itself, for that is stock property, not at all fresh. We didn't expect to see the girl take that dive into the river after the villainous thief, and it gave us a thrill, and there are one or two other good things in the picture. There are some pretty backgrounds, but for the most part they are out of focus. The heroine is played by Irene Boyle. Earle Foxe is the hero, J. R. Ross is the mill owner, and S. Holmes the thief.

"THE LIFE-TIMER" (Selig), March 26.—A picture in which the heroine has a dream and walks in her sleep out to the mountains where her lover, now a life-timer, had killed his man in self-defense, and there finds the missing gun that would have shown him to be innocent. This doesn't seem very likely. There is much good in the picture, some lovely snow scenes being not the least of its assets. It was written and produced by W. Duncan, who also has the leading male role. The opposite role is taken by Myrtle Stedman. Florence Dye, Tom Mix and Lester Cunio are also in the cast.

"SHANGHAI, CHINA" (Selig), March 26.—A short but interesting picture taken, for the most part, along the wharves of this Chinese city. The photography is clear enough, but lacks quality.

"THE MODERN PRODIGAL" (Vitagraph), March 28.—"The modern prodigal" is apt to come back rich and pay off the mortgage on the old home. In this case, the home has been auctioned away, and the youth buys it back and saves his white-haired mother from scrubbing the floors at the "home." Yet, though this is sentimental enough, the way its story is built up and acted makes it a very fair two-reel feature offering. Mrs. Maurice plays the old lady and gives a fine picture of a mother's solicitude for her wayward and wandering son. The stern father is as well played by Van Dyke Brooke, while James Morrison, in the role of the son, is also pleasing. The photography is clear and has good quality.

"HEROES ONE AND ALL" (Lubin), March 29.—This two-reel special is in spots strongly melodramatic, and interesting throughout. Harry Meyers and Ethel Clayton have the leads. The feature of the picture is a big fire, in which is shown the action of the fire department from the sounding of the alarm to the rescue on ladders of the imprisoned business man and burglar. It was the latter who started the fire when he dropped a match after lighting his dark lantern. There is a good scene in a telephone exchange when the telephone operator, in love with the man struggling with a burglar, hears the sounds of the battle when the receiver in the office is knocked from its hook. The rescue of the two men imprisoned in the burning building is thrilling. In the first reel there is a vein of comedy when three suitors for the hand of a girl meet in her parlor.

"BRONCHO BILLY'S GRATEFULNESS" (Essanay), March 29.—The usual qualities will be found in this latest Broncho Billy picture. Perhaps it is somewhat below the average of such, but there is enough action in it to keep the audience attentive. It has some extremely pretty scenes, and the photography is very good.

"A WAR-TIME SIREN" (Kalem), March 29.—This picture gives some good battle scenes, and where there is an orchestra that can follow it up it will be effective. At its climax the hero, a Northern officer, escapes and reaches the Union camp just as the Confederates are driving his forces back. He grasps the starry flag and, waving it in air, turns the tide of battle. Alice Hollister is the "war-time siren," and Guy Coombs is the Northern officer. Henry Hallam and Mrs. Courtot also have roles. The photography is very fair.

"IN THE LAND OF THE CACTUS" (Lubin), March 29.—Of all the pictures today we enjoyed this the most, and liked it chiefly for its freshness and its difference. Romaine Fielding is individual, but at the same time natural and human in his pictures. He is so seldom theatrical that some think him "queer." It would be good if there were more queer producers and more scenario writers as original. It is so apparently earnest that one doesn't suspect the essential comedy in it until he sees the ending. The action and the acting, the characters and what they do, the way the scenes are chosen and everything about the picture seem quite fresh. The audience watched it with the closest interest and seemed to like it much. Romaine Fielding plays the chief role, a Mexican who has fallen in love with an American girl who thinks she is sick and takes an original way to cure her, which succeeds. Mary Ryan plays the girl, and Robyn Adair and Richard Wangeman have roles.

"THE HARDUP FAMILY'S BLUFF" (Pathe), March 29.—This picture made more laughter than any other picture today. The Hardup family decide to close the house and pretend to go away for the season, but a burglar comes, and before many minutes the whole neighborhood is in the house. That burglar is a first-rate comedian, and the offering stands securely on his work. He is, in this situation, very funny and will make the picture popular.

"THE TWO BROTHERS" (Vitagraph), March 29.—A very tragic picture, made effective by good acting. It starts with a conventional melodramatic situation and then refuses to be sentimential, so, with these players, the audience found it deeply interesting. George C. Stanley plays both brothers and makes them so distinct that it doesn't help the picture, for it isn't known. Mary Charleson plays a Mexican, the younger brother's sweetheart, who sees the old father (C. Bennett) killed by the older brother. It is moonlight, and she has to testify against her lover, who is hanged. Later she finds that it was the other brother, so she stabs him. The photography is very clear. Execution scene not shown in the offering.

"THE SHERIFF'S BABY" (Biograph). March 29.—All kinds of Wild West melodrama will be found in this picture—Indians, wild animals, outlaws and the thirst of the desert all conspire, so to speak, to rob the baby of his short life; but fate wills otherwise. It gives a good picture of the desert and has speedy action. In places it is a bit awkward from slow turning on the part of the camera man. Those half-instant scenes, in which we catch a glimpse of quivering fingers and waving arms, but see nothing else, are not very effective.

"GLIMPSES OF NAPLES AND VICINITY" (Cines), March 29.—A clear picture that gives us an idea of Naples and includes a view of Virgil's tomb, which many will be glad to see. The usual "travel" picture is not nearly so interesting as it might be, because they seldom have any single idea behind them. If, for instance, views of Umbria were given, such as "Scenes that St. Francis Knew," and included not merely buildings of the modern Franciscans, but panorama views from Assisi, from St. Damian's and the Portiuncula, etc., how much more interesting they would be.

"SPIRITS OF YOUTH" (Cines). March 29.—Brisk farce; a comical picture of a very wonderful tonic. Trick photography makes it seem real in the way this works. The audience liked it.

"BETWEEN ORTON JUNCTION AND FALLONVILLE" (Edison), March 29.—A railroad melodrama, written and produced by Charles M. Seay. It held the audience more strongly than any offering today, with perhaps one exception. The heroic role is played by Bigelow Cooper, who, at the climax, did extremely well—better than his work as the bashful and unfortunate lover in the picture's first scenes promised. The mistake of the man at Fallonville lets a train get past which will meet the train from Orton unless it can be stopped. Bigelow is warned, but as the engineer (Agustus Phillips) of the passenger is his rival he is tempted to do nothing —it wasn't his mistake. He calls up Edna Flugarth, the girl, and sends her galloping to the big curve to head the trains off. Agustus has the girl, but Bigelow has the satisfaction of being a man with a fine character. It is a clearly pictured and effective story.

"WOMEN OF THE DESERT" (Lubin), March 31.—This love story of the Sahara was taken in Florida and makes a very fair offering, chiefly because the Lubin company was able to find backgrounds that give a suggestion of reality to its desert scenes, where the Arab tents are pitched, and also to the Moorish town, the palace of the Calif, where the Bedouin hero finds and rescues the lovely heroine sold into slavery by her jealous sister. There is an incantation scene in it that furnishes its one real touch of imagination—the one place where the picture rises above others of its kind. This is fresh and very effective. The photography is clear, but the acting isn't so truly sympathetic as are the backgrounds and scenes. It was produced by G. O. Nicholls from a script of E. W. Sargent. Ormi Hawley and Edwin Carewe play the leads. Mrs. Nicholls does very well as the "weird woman" in the incantation scene.

"THE AMERICAN PRINCESS" (Kalem), March 31.—The best story, from the viewpoint of the audience, but not the most skillfully built story. We are speaking only of today's regular releases. It is an interesting offering, with a good deal of freshness, without anything that can be called at all new. The hero is a diplomatic officer in Washington who has got into debt buying lovely dresses for his wife. The foreign spy tempts him and he nearly falls. The chief difference is that in most pictures of this situation the girl is a princess only by right, while here she is a princess by both right and title. It is both well acted and beautifully photographed. Alice Joyce is the princess. Tom Moore is the hero; his way of showing determination is, in this picture, almost amusing for just one-half second. E. L. Davenport is her father, the king; Naomi Childers, her maid, and E. P. Gibbs, the spy.

"THE ELDER BROTHER" (Edison), March 31.—Anne and Banister Merwin in this picture have treated an old situation a bit more sincerely than the usual offering, and have made a very fair release. William West plays a very convincing minister who won't let his daughter (Mary Fuller) marry the scapegrace younger brother (Harry Beaumont), whose elder brother (Richard Tucker) also loves the girl, but doesn't win her. Is very intelligently acted and makes a substantial offering.

"THE SPY'S DEFEAT" (Essanay), March 31.—A two-part special release which we have reviewed at length. See page 1316, issue of March 29th.

"PATHE'S WEEKLY," March 31.—A better number than last week. Perhaps the most generally interesting item is the view of the dedication of the Cleveland home at Caldwell, N. J. It gives a good view of the two Clevelands of this generation and will interest a great many. A long item gives glimpses of Mexico City and makes plain the havoc of a pitched battle among city houses—a rather illuminating series of views. Besides there are some glimpses of notable people. The photography is not as clear as desirable in the Mexican pictures.

"EDWIN MASQUERADES" (Biograph), March 31.—A burlesque that was intended to make laughter, and succeeded with the audience with whom we saw it. It has some very good points.

"THEIR ONE GOOD SUIT" (Biograph), March 31.—Not so effective in making the laughs as the other on this reel, and it is also a burlesque. Audiences who like frivolous pictures seem to like these time-killers a good deal.

"A PRISONER OF CABANAS" (Selig), March 31.—A Cuba libre melodrama with an American hero, played by Thomas Santschi. The pretty heroine is taken by Bessie Eyton. It has a conventional plot, with a villainous Spanish officer who has his face slapped by Santschi for getting fresh with the girl. Later he is captured by the villain and taken to Cabanas, and the girl brings the Cubans to the rescue. They take the town. There are some fine fighting pictures and some good scenes; one or two of them are lovely. Well acted and clearly photographed, it seemed to please the audience.

"BEDELIA BECOMES A LADY" (Vitagraph), March 31.—A burlesque by the Western company, with Mary Charleson as Bedelia, a gawky girl who gets $500 to spend on dress, and becomes a character like the Bedelia of the Reliance pictures of a year ago. George Stanley plays her rural lover. It cuts pretty close to what is coarse, and made loud laughter from some, and once in a while general laughter from all.

"MARGARITA AND THE MISSION FUNDS" (Selig), April 1.—There is a good deal in this picture that isn't wholly clear; but the story shows that an American, a captain in the Mexican service, saves certain funds stolen from the church by a bandit and wins a girl. There is a beautifully danced fandango in it and this helps it out as an offering. We like the acting and the scenes. It is not a great, but a serviceable picture. W. A. Corey is the author and the script was produced by Lem Parker. Harry Otto plays the priest; H. A. Lockwood, the American; E. Loveridge, the heroine, and Al. Garcia, the bandit. Gordie Colwell dances. The photography as a whole is clear.

"CHECKMATED" (Vitagraph), April 1.—A melodramatic picture of business life in New York, by W. L. Tremayne. The story is distinctly good and the audience liked it; but it might easily have been more effectively written. Larry Trimble has put it on most commendably. Florence Turner plays the leading role and makes the most of it. Tom Powers is likable in the hero's role opposite to her. The villains (Why were there two?) are Herbert Barry and Rogers Lytton. One feels that it should have been done in two reels and done more convincingly; but it is a very good offering.

"SHIPPING A CLOCK" (Lubin), April 1.—A character burlesque that is very well acted, but that is not very funny. The players, Clarence Elmer and Jennie Nelson, are pleasing in themselves and show competence.

"THE FAKE SOLDIERS" (Lubin), April 1.—This is a real farce and we can report that it pleased, for there was a good deal of laughter. It is made by adding to an old farcical plot a new situation and the result gives fresh entertainment and amusement. The author is Arthur Hotaling and his leading characters are played by Walter Stull and Robert Burns, the fake soldiers, and by Mae Hotely and Julia Calhoun, their wives. It is a better farce than usually found found on the screen.

"THE EXPOSURE OF THE LAND SWINDLERS" (Kalem), April 1.—This three reel special offering has been reviewed at length; see page 795, issue of February 22, 1913.

"THE SHERIFF'S SON" (Essanay), April 1.—Makes a fair commercial offering with action that is clear, except at one place, a very noticeable gap in the story which leaves the ending unconvincing. Arthur Mackley's company produced it and the acting is, of course, intelligent, although the heroine shows lack of experience. She is young and the personality of her picture is good company. The photography is clear and there are some lovely night landscapes.

"HE WOULDN'T GIVE UP" (Cines), April 1.—A farce of courtship with the often-seen persistent suitor whom the girl likes, but whom the father won't have. There was a little laughter toward the end, not much; but the series of incidents seemed to interest. The players are acceptable and there are some pretty scenes.

"HOW PLASTER IS OBTAINED" (Patheplay), April 1.—A clearly photographed view of a big gypsum mine, the kilns, the crusher, etc. This subject interests a good many people and is a valuable offering.

"THE MOROS" (Patheplay), April 1.—A troop of acrobats, two men and a woman, in an exhibition on a trapeze. It is hand-colored.

"WITH THE EYES OF THE BLIND" (Edison), April 1.—There is much beauty in this picture and it tells a dramatic story of a blind girl (Mary Fuller) who, before her eyes were cured, had a chance to pass her hand over the face of a man—Was he her father's murderer? Later, her eyes have been cured and she and the man fall in love. She passes her hand over his face and the memory comes back of that night when her father was lying dead and an unconscious man beside him. There it ends, even the acting which falls through at the climax, suggests no outlet. Yet the situation had elements of weakness and perhaps it was wise to treat it as here; for to go on would have laid bare the dilemma in an incongruity. It is a beautifully made picture with lovely scenes and strongly marked characters. The old men, played by William West and Charles Ogle, are the highest points in the offering. The blind girl plays some dramatic moments finely. Marc MacDermott has a disjointed and almost impossible role to play; but shows his intelligence. Robert Brower and Mrs. Erskine also appear. The producer, Walter Edwin, deserves a great deal of credit for making what he has out of this script. It will be admired in spite of its ending.

Independent

"THE HALF-WIT" (Reliance), March 29.—There is a certain pathos attaching to a picture of this type, wherein a mentally deficient person is featured. In this case the half-wit, Bud, saves the girl in a runaway, and falls hopelessly in love with her. Later she is married and goes to the city. Bud carries a message to them from her relenting parents. He saves the young husband from a beating, at the cost of his own life. The close is touching.

"THE HALF-BREED PARSON" (Bison), March 29.—A two-reel offering, centering about Asa, a half-breed theological student. We see him arriving home among the Indians and preaching among them. Then he meets the colonel's daughter in the woods and assists her with her lame horse. She takes him to the fort, where he relieves the chaplain, who is ill. Other characters are introduced, including Mona, Asa's sister, and the young officer who insults her. The story is not very new, but it is logically worked out and holds the attention. The photography gives some splendid sunlight effects, though at times the focus is not quite accurate. The second reel works up to a strong, though rather obvious, climax.

"THE WAX LADY" (Thanhouser), March 30.—A whimsical conception, in which a fairy brings to life the dummies in the old Jew's window. Numerous amusing situations develop and the Jew is punished for his general avarice and dishonesty. The film makes a good novelty with which to vary a program.

"THE ROMANCE OF A FISHERBOY" (Excelsior), March 31.—This film contains some pleasing effects, notably the last one, where the boat drifts back at high tide, bringing the fisherboy's willful young wife back to him. The young wife's checkered career has much of interest in it; her escape from the yacht was nicely shown. A good release.

"A KNOTTY KNOT" (Champion), March 31.—A German milkmaid and her lover are leading characters in this story of the open road. They saw wood and do washings to get money for a wedding license. There is nothing objectionable in the picture, and as low comedy it has several points of merit.

"THE WOMAN WHO DIDN'T CARE" (Thanhouser), April 1.—An allegorical film story, in which a witch converts a scarecrow into a nobleman in order to punish the heartless woman who has broken so many hearts. As the wedding ceremony is in progress the nobleman again becomes a scarecrow. A successful offering of its type.

"A STUDY IN SOCIOLOGY" (Majestic), April 1.—In this there is a realistic raid on a gambling den, in which the erring young son is unexpectedly relieved of suspicion of being a jewel thief. The gems are found on the person of the scheming Randolph. The story is chopped off rather short, but is connected and interesting throughout.

"A HOUSE DIVIDED" (Bison), April 1.—The acting and photography in this three-reel production are better than the plot, though it varies the ordinary war story somewhat. The Union spies—a man and a woman—come to the home of General Culver and obtain information about the Confederate plans from his daughters. The plot lacks conviction when Virginia consents to give up her father's plans to pay off a gambling debt. The gagging of the other sister and carrying her upstairs smacked more of the melodrama than of warfare. Outside of these numerous theatrical touches the picture is very attractive.

"ANIMATED WEEKLY No. 55" (Universal), April 2.—St. Patrick's Day parade in New York; powder explosion in Sydney, Australia; a realistic auto accident; pictures of "Brentwood," the oldest fire horse in New York; Boy Scouts at Mt. Vernon; views on a Rhode Island turkey farm; aero races in Hendon, England—these are but part of an interesting number of the weekly.

"THE SUPERIOR LAW" (Eclair), April 2.—This is a splendid three-reel dramatization of Sir Gilbert Parker's "The Right of Way." In it we have visualized, though under different names in some cases, the characters of Charley Steele, Kathleen, Rosalie and the half-breed, Joe. J. W. Johnston, as the scoffing, monacle-wearing, drink-loving lawyer, is very satisfying; likewise is Barbara Tennant as Rosalie. The story is of the rugged Northwest, and the snow scenes and others are in keeping. The crime in the beginning of the first reel is a little vague, and we do not think the religious flavor of the production will be entirely clear to those not familiar with the story. But it is big in theme and far ahead of the ordinary production of the kind. A fine offering.

"FIDDLE PETE" (Rex), April 3.—There are a choice lot of characters in this, and the setting makes one sit up in expectation of a treat. But the scenes are jerky and the relationship of the characters not well shown. The minister marries "Piano" Maggie at the close, and Pete dies from drink, with his fiddle in his hand. A promising beginning, but rather disappointing as a whole.

"THE BANDIT'S REDEMPTION" (Frontier), April 3.—In this picture a band of outlaws make a night attack on a wagon train. They bring away two children, one a girl wearing a necklace with her dead mother's picture in it. The bandit, moved by love of the children, gives up his life and moves elsewhere with them. Fifteen years later he tells them they are not brother and sister, as they had supposed. The story is full of improbabilities and hardly strong enough in its presentation to make us forget this. The photography is good.

"A PROVIDENTIAL TRAGEDY" (Nestor), April 4.—Jack, falsely accused of shooting the boss of the ranch, escapes to the wilderness. He finds a baby in the arms of its dying mother. He takes the child back home, to find that his own wife has had and lost a son in his absence. So the little stranger is welcome, indeed. This touching story would be a little stronger if it were shown more definitely, by sub-title or otherwise, that Jack's own baby is dead; this would give more pull to the plot. It is very well photographed.

"THE SPOILED DARLING'S DOLL" (Thanhouser), April 4.—This is another triumph for those delightful Thanhouser Kids, who bring this simple children's story out in clever style. The one who plays the doll must indeed be a born little actress, as she is certainly not more than two or three years old. A remarkably attractive film for women and children in particular.

"THE WOMAN WHO KNEW" (Reliance), April 5.—This film is powerful in its psychological effect. Mae Bottie and Irving Cummings are the young couple in love. He drinks, and the girl says she will marry him if the mother advises it. Then comes a remarkably strong and artistic effect, in which Sue Balfour, as the mother, sees in the frame of her dead husband's picture the causes which brought about his death. The scenes are graphic, indeed, and when the mother finally tears up her half-written letter, advising the girl to marry her son, the observer feels that her heart has been laid bare. A strong film.

"THE HALF ORPHANS" (Majestic), April 6.—A rather amusing drawing-room comedy, which becomes burlesque at the close, in which two people, desiring to look young, dress their grown-up children as a boy and girl. In the end both couples are married.

"BOBBY'S BABY" (Rex), April 6.—A very touching little film story, in which a young couple, mourning for their lost child, discover in a barn the baby Bobby is out getting milk for. They take it home eagerly, and Bobby has a hard time locating it, but in the end both he and the child find happiness. A pleasing conception and worked out in a way that will give it wide appeal.

"PEARL AS A CLAIRVOYANT" (Crystal), April 6.—Pearl bribes Madame Scero to let her read Chester's fortune. A typical Crystal half reel.

"ALMOST A WINNER" (Crystal), April 6.—This, on same reel with above, is more amusing than the other. Mr. Trimmins, coming home late from the club, lets out the burglar his wife has locked in the closet. The burglar locks him in. A pleasing idea.

"CUPID THROWS A BRICK" (American), April 7.—In this film Warren Kerrigan and Jack Richardson give us the contrast between strong and weak men combating for the hand of the heroine, played by Jessalyn Van Trump. Jack throws a brickbat at his rival, and by so doing knocks him into the girl's good graces. The hero later does good for evil by saving Jack's life. An entertaining number.

"TEMPERAMENTAL ALICE" (Excelsior), April 7.—Alice Inward and Arthur Finn are the young couple in this attractive comedy. It is well pictured and holds the interest, though in spots the scenario is weak. It is hard to believe the girl, however temperamental, would stand out in a soaking rain to make the secretary come to her rescue. The closing scenes are better than this.

"BILLY GETS ARRESTED" (Gem), April 8.—In which Billy Quirk is a young married man who will not get home early. His wife locks him out, and he and his friend are mistaken for burglars and arrested. There are no very new situations in this, but it is well acted and diverting.

"THE NIGHT RIDERS" (Majestic), April 8.—This production gets up quite a lot of legitimate excitement, with its Southern setting and hot blood in action. The plot begins immediately after Harvey decides to bolt the cotton agreement and is visited by night riders. The chase of the colored man through the jungle was very well pictured, as well as the girl's rescue of both this man and her lover. An offering full of thrills which adhere closely to the truth and are accordingly convincing.

"THE GRAY SENTINEL" (Broncho), April 9.—This two-reel war story is stronger in its scenic effects than in its story, the latter being just a little obscure in places. The combination of mountain and seacoast scenery is very attractive, however, and keeps the offering in front rank. The "Gray Sentinel" is a lighthouse, around which much of the action centers. One of the young men in love with the girl is a traitor. The battle scenes are strong, and the struggle on the tower exciting. A good release.

"THE STRONGER CALL" (Reliance), April 9.—A very good film story, in which the sheriff gives Jack a gun filled with blank cartridges, intending to rob him while acting as messenger. Jack shoots at a moose (the scene being nicely shown in Bronx Park) and discovers the cartridges are blanks. As a result of this discovery he later kills the sheriff, thinking him an outlaw. The daughter is horrified when she learns the truth, but later goes to her lover. A good release.

"AUNT KATE'S MISTAKE" (Imp), April 10.—A fairly amusing film, in which Estelle Kibby, as the wealthy aunt, advertises for a husband. Her niece, an attractive girl, comes to visit her, and their love affairs get sadly tangled.

"PEDRO'S REVENGE" (Majestic), April 10.—The suspense in this picture is wrought up where the girl holds back two ruffians with a pitchfork in a haymow. The hero finally arrives and there are exciting hand-to-hand encounters on the barn floor. Laura Lyman and Harry Kimball have the leading parts. In the fore part of the picture, which is above the average in merit, there are some Florida orange grove scenes.

"ON FORTUNE'S WHEEL" (Kay-Bee), April 11.—In this strong two-reel story a rascally bank president escapes from the crime of robbery, for which an innocent clerk is sentenced for fifteen years on circumstantial evidence. Later years bring interesting developments, all admirably acted and photographed. The clerk escapes from prison and discovers the former bank president in the West, where he is turning numerous sharp deals. Retribution follows, and there is a love story of interest in the last reel. A good release.

"TWO LIVES" (Victor), April 11.—An entertaining story, based on the poem in which two lives are destined to meet and find happiness. James Kirkwood and Edna Lockman portray two people who drift out from the life of the underworld, after years of sin, and meet in a cemetery, at the grave of the girl's mother. Julia Curley plays the part of the grandmother. The scenes in this are quietly presented and are not overdrawn.

"THE HOMESTEAD RACE" (American), April 12.—This story features the race made by the girl's lover to file on a homestead. He finally gets an auto at the last moment and beats the villains to the land office. There is good suspense in the film, and while the situation is not a new one, it holds the observer well.

"A WOMAN'S HONOR" (American), April 12.—This is an attractive film story, in which Warren Kerrigan appears as the parish priest. He desires the girl to marry a good young man, but she is fascinated by Jack Richardson, the backslider. Charlotte Burton plays the cast-off woman, and there is just an interesting glimpse of Louise Lester as the village gossip. In the end virtue triumphs and the right man gets the girl. A good offering.

"IN THE BATTLE'S SMOKE" (Pilot), April 3.—This is a melodrama of a pronounced type. The story is of a feudist who kills a man and leaves the section. Later, in the Civil War, the slayer and the son of the man killed meet on the field of battle. There is a combat when the recognition takes place, which is later followed by a reconciliation. It is not a strong story.

"WHEN THIEVES FALL OUT" (Gaumont Special).—Three reels of finely photographed drama. There are many fine interiors and settings, as befits the station of the characters. The story is interesting and well acted.

WARNER'S FEATURES NOTES.

The Dallas office of Warner's Features Film Company, has removed to 1519½ Main Street, and is now under the management of Clyde Slater. Mr. Slater was connected with the Mutual for some time as road man and has had a wide experience as a practical film renter.

M. J. Goldbaum, manager of the St. Louis office, has secured larger quarters in the Benoist Building, Suite 303-304.

The devastating floods in Ohio and Indiana have seriously crippled the Cleveland and Indianapolis offices. Express companies refused to accept film for delivery in the stricken states and theaters were in darkness and knee deep in water in dozens of cities. It is to be hoped that the recovery will be rapid.

Exhibitors wishing to be placed on the mailing list to receive gratis, Warner's Feature News—a monthly magazine of information—should send their names to the home office.

MILDRED ZUKOR'S BIRTHDAY FILM.

Mildred Zukor, daughter of Adolph Zukor, owns a moving picture of her own, of which she is prouder than is her father of all his film holdings. The daughter of the President of the Famous Players Film Company celebrated her thirteenth birthday on Sunday, March 30th, and imbued with her father's ambition to film the famous players, she decided to perpetuate her own famous playmates, so a moving picture was taken of the birthday party, which was held at the studio of the Famous Players Film Company. Mildred Zukor wrote the scenario, assisted in the production, and did not neglect the part of the star, particularly while the food was in evidence. Several hundred feet were taken, including title and subtitles, a la a regular production. In succession were shown the entrance hall of the Zukor home, and the arrival of the guests; the drawing-room, the family at home, and the entrance of the children; a dance; the dining-room, and the birthday party.

$30 000 THEATER FOR PATCHOGUE, N. Y.

Earle L. Holmes, of Patchogue, N. Y., is building a $30,000 moving picture theater in that city. It is expected to be ready for business by May 30th. Its appointments will compare favorably with a first-class Broadway house and its seating capacity will be 1,400. Its dimensions are 60 feet by 175 feet.

MARGARET LOVERIDGE.

Miss Margaret Loveridge has gone to the Selig Company after having tried out in several Selig productions. She was originally a Biographer, but was loaned to the Essanay Company during one of the illnesses of Miss Vedah Bertram. She returned to the Biograph and recently played with Keystone, but is on the licensed side again. Miss Mae Marsh, of the Biograph, is her sister.

"THE CUTTLE-FISH" (Eclair).

ANOTHER denizen of the ocean has been brought from the "deep places of the earth" and its secrets revealed by the all-searching and penetrating eye of the micro-camera. Again the subject is one of those complete ones, in which an important lesson is introduced, continued, and finished in one reel.

The cuttle-fish is a kind of mollusc with feet, and is caught by fishermen in nets with fish as bait; they are chiefly found swimming in the sandy bottoms. The eggs of the cuttle-fish are sometimes called sea grapes, because of their similarity to bunches of grapes. They are attached to the stalks of tall growing sea-weed, and are often thrown up by the tide.

Each egg is surrounded by an elastic membrane which is transparent, and in the interior of which the embryo is developed. Contrary to the usual care required in the handling of eggs, those of the cuttle-fish seem to be able to withstand rather rough treatment without danger. The shelling of the egg by stripping off the elastic membrane at the time of maturity, releases the young cuttle-fish, which hatches out in perfect form.

The newly hatched fish is only two centimetres long, when full grown, its head is surmounted by a crown of tentacles, these tentacles are fitted with strong valves which are very adhesive, giving them great holding power. To breathe, the cuttle-fish absorbs and rejects the water through special orifices; this process of breathing is very interesting to watch, it is shown in enlarged detail upon the screen and looks like a powerful piece of machinery at work.

In the full grown fish there is in the middle of the crown of tentacles a mouth with a strong beak, the bite of which is much feared by fishermen. The dorsal part has the same kind of bone as are found in birds, this bone is also of well known use by bird fanciers.

The cuttle-fish secretes a black liquid called sepia, which is intended to protect it when attacked, in that it makes the water muddy. The Chinese make India ink of this "sepia liquid." There is also a smaller and seemingly special kind of cuttle-fish which is called the Sepia-Fish.

The power of exuding the sepia or black liquid is splendidly shown when in combat. The picture shows an audacious young crab attacking a sepia fish, but he is soon blinded by the black sticky fluid squirted at him by his enemy; the water is immediately like a black cloud and has the appearance of being an exceedingly unpleasant place for the enemy of the cuttle-fish.

The whole picture is a continuation of the same high standard which marks this class of subjects now being prepared in such numbers for the schools and of which it is hoped due appreciation will be shown by good use of them at every opportunity. W. H. J.

NIGHT SCHOOLS WITHOUT TEACHERS.

The winter night school is an institution almost as old as the day school, its need has always been felt. The growth of educational facilities have only enlarged the scope of the night session by making them the means introducing subjects impossible in the daily curriculum. With the use of the moving picture in the schools the opportunities of the night school have been still further enlarged in a two-fold manner. In the first place a greater variety of subjects can be taught more thoroughly and in less time, while, in the second place, the self-explanatory powers of many of the pictures makes the presence of a teacher unnecessary. This plan has already been tried in Italy under the supervision of the Minister of Public Instruction. Such a school has been opened in Milan, where 300 people assemble nightly for especially arranged profitable instruction, these schools are to be opened all over Italy under the management of a specially appointed board. It should be stated, however, that the subjects used are not elementary, but rather those of a higher order and which are to be of greater use to an adult audience. In opening the first school the Minister of Public Instruction emphasized the advantage of pictures over books by noticing that while it took one hundred years to bring printing to a useful state, the cinematograph had reached that stage in about fifteen years. W. H. J.

PICTURES FROM UNCIVILIZED LANDS.

The islands of the Pacific are soon to be brought to our doors—on the screen—by means of a series of pictures taken by a photographer who accompanied the famous novelist Jack London on a voyage, which is said to have thoroughly covered some hundreds of islands of the Pacific Ocean. Some ten thousand feet of films have been secured, illustrations of "the curious corners of Polynesia," where cannibalism is still practiced, and where the tribes are engaged in perpetual internicine warfare. Some excellent pictures of the fauna and flora of these islands are promised, many of which have never before been brought to the light of civilization. The inhabitants of Malita, one of the Solomons, are especially shown, famous for their treachery, they fight with poisoned arrows, the poison being obtained from decayed human bodies which remain after their cannabalistic appetites have been satisfied.

When it is suggested that there are 400,000 of these islands and that representative pictures have been taken, great interest and diversity of matter will be at the service of the schools which have hitherto been very limited in their knowledge of the islands of the Pacific, the films will, we are promised, possess more than geographical and natural-history interest. NOTES RECORDING THE GROWTH OF THE EDUCATIONAL PICTURE.

A western clergyman recently expressed himself as envious of the opportunity of the moving picture exhibitor in his powers of usefulness and constant occasions for doing good. Without doubt hundreds of exhibitors are unconscious of both their powers as well as the attendant opportunities. This page has many times pointed out to the exhibitor how he has the first chance in his own hands to influence those about him for mutual profit; many have responded even to the extent of writing for advice and help how best to further their interests in these ways. Another clergyman finds that while the picture house does not hurt his church it does possess the greater "drawing power" and he is compelled to study the question on its merits; another occasion for an alliance between the exhibitor and the minister.

The Christian Herald has in its recent issue an account of the making of moving pictures in Jerusalem, this is worthy of notice from the fact that this paper is the greatest religious paper in the world. It has a circulation in every part of the civilized world, and is read by more rural subscribers than any paper. That this paper should now devote a special article to the moving picture interest is a great compliment which will be of more than ordinary value, nullifying much harm and doing much good. W. H. J.

THE EDUCATIONAL PICTURE.

By the Rev. E. Boudinot Stockton, S. T. B.

THE following catalog of educational pictures and photoplays suitable for religious and educational work covers the releases from March 1st to 10th, inclusive, and brings the catalog as nearly down to date as it is at present possible to do. The next installment will contain the releases from March 11th to 20th, inclusive, and succeeding installments will give the releases for a week at a time. It is believed that this method will enable exhibitors and others to make a more practical use of the catalog and that it will thus be of more value and service to them than a longer list published at greater intervals and consequently not so frequently brought up to date. From time to time as it is deemed advisable these regular lists will be supplemented by special ones giving the available pictures for special occasions such as Decoration Day, The Fouth of July, etc. We shall be very glad also to furnish special lists on other topics that may be needed in particular localities or by particular exhibitors if request is made and a self-addressed and stamped envelope is inclosed with the request for the reply. We shall also be glad to hear from any one who has suggestions or criticisms to offer tending towards making these lists more serviceable and valuable to those interested in using the educational picture.

TO BUILD NEW THEATER.

There was recently formed and organized in Missoula, Mont., the Missoula Amusement Company, with a capitalization of $10,000. It is the intention of the company to build and operate a moving picture theater in the Forbis Building, situated on Higgins Avenue, Missoula, Mont. The architect's plans call for the addition of twenty-six feet to the rear of the building, thereby making the dimensions 120 feet deep by 25 feet frontage. The house will have a seating capacity of over 500 persons. No name has yet been given the proposed theater, and it is the purpose of the management to hold this in reserve, leaving it to the decision of the patrons, for which a prize will be given. The incorporators of the Missoula Amusement Company are Otis O. Hoyt, Fred C. Quimby, Phil Kenny and Dan Heyfron.

WANTS CATALOGUES.

W. I. Hipple, 134 Oley Street, Reading, Pa., is soon to open a moving picture theater with a seating capacity of six hundred, and would like to hear from manufacturers of chairs, machines, curtains, fixtures, etc., of their prices and catalogues.

CHANGES PROGRAM.

A. J. Xydias, of the Xydias Amusement Company, Houston, Texas, owner of the Star and Rex picture theater, that city, has recently turned independent. He was followed in the same move by the management of the Gem, Dixie and Crescent theaters, also of that city.

MISS MAY BUCKLEY,
New Leading Lady for the Selig Company.

Music for the Picture

BY CLARENCE E SINN

MISS VEOLA THOMPSON who is lecturing on features in the Pacific States, contributes the following: "Some weeks ago Mr. ——, from Albany, Oregon, contributed an interesting article on effects as produced in the Peoples Theater, Portland, Oregon. Yes, this particular theater has unquestionably a most capable sound effect drummer. His general knowledge of various musical instruments contribute along with an elegant compressed air outfit. Besides these requirements he has a faculty of knowing when and how to produce an effect.

"With an unprejudiced mind I desire to give due credit to conscientious musical artists, forgetting, if possible, that I am a professional, and in so doing I have closely listened to the offering of Los Angeles, San Francisco and Oakland leaders this winter. In many instances, I am sorry to say, the picture music seems to show indifference and a lack of intelligence; a strong desire to use present-day compositions on plots one hundred years old. Perhaps they wanted to please the masses with popular music. However, I do not believe this method wins in the end. Many houses are confining themselves to the mechanical organ operated by a musician. This style of music is popular in San Francisco and Oakland; one man accomplishes the work of ten and this is "great"—financially. Mr. Grauman's Imperial is truly a palace from an architectural point of view. His par excellent orchestra consisting of piano, organ, violin, 'cello, flute and drums, reaches the climaxes beautifully and makes the musical changes seemingly without effort or discord. They forget to accompany those "hairy pants" and "broncho" subjects with an asphalt paving effect during the wooly cayuse ride, and what a treat this is.

"A great number of theaters in California cities seem to feel justified in offering few sound effects. We know the audience loves to talk over the plot; to surmise in words the outcome of the scenario on the screen; to read the "leaders" aloud. Therefore why not permit this harmless habit and play soft music more or less throughout. Do let the people talk and make this possible by softening the drum whenever the situation will permit." [Why not say, "eliminating" the drums in such situations? That would be better. Ed.] "Whatever progress we make in this field of art, let us endeavor to heed the suggestions of those who think and apply the compositions of the masters on all films of a dramatic and educational nature, for this alone, I believe, will elevate the musical atmosphere surrounding the picture."

The writer of the above has contributed to this department before. She is a clever musician and character actress, and has been a successful manager. At present she is being featured in her portrayals of "Dante's Inferno," "A Day in the Alps," and educational subjects, and her long experience in different phases of picture work makes her opinions worthy of consideration. Whatever progress made by picture-music is due largely to those who not only "think and apply," but are willing to share the results of their experience. C. K. Aiken, H. R. Seeman, Maurice Komroff, C. B. Lagerquist, Chas. S. Offenberg, Maude Waters Dittmar and a host of other contributors are among those who "think and apply."

C. V. E. writes: "Why is it, I would like to ask, that most moving picture pianists will sacrifice the sentiment contained in a picture to a popular air, whether it fits the scene or not? I have played for the pictures for over 14 years" [that is a long time. Ed.] "and have only been out of work for one month during that time. I say if a picture calls for Old Hundred, or Yankee Doodle don't be afraid to play it. Use your brains as well as your fingers and learn to use them both at the same time, the brains a little in advance, in order to get the right affect, you must feel the sentiment and make the audience feel it, dramas should be played to three-four time. Westerns to two-four time, comedies to ragtime, if you like, but the time must fit the action of the picture. In short, build your music as carefully as you would for an opera."

The writer of the above is evidently sincere, though his letter may appear a little out of focus. I don't quite get that last, however. Why should dramas "be played to three-four time?" An opera is usually supposed to be dramatic; how can you build your picture music "as carefully as you would for an opera" if you confine yourself to three-four time? When our best pictures have special music written for them (as they soon will), this music will, or should be adapted to the action of the picture as it is to the dramatic action in opera, and the composer will use whatever movements, figures or tempi that seem best adapted to the various scenes according to his judgment.

7. "Miama." (Moret.) until she brings Doctor W. into house.
8. Introduction to "Fra Diavolo" overture. I begun this after the drum solo and kept repeating softly giving a mysterioso character to the music until title: "Colonel Ashley Attacks the Union Forces."
9. Short agitato until sick room. Then:
10. Pathetic to swell and diminish according to alternating scenes until battle scene.
11. Hurry until change.

2. "In a Lotus Field" (Bratton), until two horsemen ride away from steps.
3. Light agitato until title: "Lieutenant Driscoll is Persistent."

1. Light mysterious until man falls on porch.
2. Agitato p. and f. until title: "Three Years Later."
3. "Twilight—A Reverie." (by N. D. Ayer; pub. by Remick.) until "A Wise Old Elephant."

5. Tschaikowsky's "Chant Sans Paroles," (play rather quickly), until elephant gives cradle to parents.
6. "Teddy Bears Picnic," until end of reel.

CONEY ISLAND FACTORY ABANDONED.

Beginning at an early date, the new Thanhouser factory at New Rochelle will, in addition to its own work, also handle the thousands of feet of film made from the negatives produced by the Reliance and Majestic studios. As the Thanhouser Company has long been noted for its splendid photography, this move will insure the Reliance and Majestic the same high grade of pictures, photographically, that they have been recently releasing. As a result, the large manufacturing plant at Coney Island, which also has a very good daylight studio in connection with it, will be on the market.

Foreign Trade Notes

THE Prussian government has announced its intention of using the motion picture for the education of young people who have not the means to go any higher than the common schools. Experts are to be selected for the selection of proper places of exhibition and suitable films. Five thousand negatives are to be purchased at once.

In the three cities of Berlin, Hamburg and Dresden the authorities are extremely strict in the enforcement of ordinances against the admission of children into the electric theaters. In the first two cities children under the age of six are absolutely barred from the motion picture theaters, and minors between the ages of six and sixteen years can only be admitted in the afternoon. In Dresden no minors under sixteen are admitted at any time. Children in the latter city may be admitted on special occasions to see special programs previously approved by their teachers.

Exhibitors in Vienna, Austria, are up in arms against the decision of the imperial chancellor permitting the use of the Comedy Theater, one of the famous showhouses of the city, to use motion pictures for matinees three times per week. They say the competition is very harmful to their interests and they point to excessive licenses and taxes they have to pay to keep their own theaters going. Every license in Vienna is revocable at the pleasure of the police, without any remedy whatever.

The "bicycling" of films is a common practice in Hungary. Two and sometimes three exhibitors use the same film service on the same night, boys on bicycles rushing from one theater to another. An exchange in Budapest has now made a rule depriving the "bicycling" offenders of all service, whenever they are caught.

A number of French and Swiss reformers have recently held a meeting in Geneva and solemnly resolved to extend their crusade against the motion picture all over the world. The first step is to be an international congress against the motion picture, to which all enemies of the motion picture are to be invited from everywhere.

Our esteemed French contemporary, Ciné Journal, eloquently bestows the freedom of the city of Paris upon Mr. Smith, of the Vitagraph company, who is now a visitor in the French capital.

The efforts of the organized exhibitors in Southern France to resist and defy the encroachments of the police have been successful. The courts have decided in favor of the rights of cinematography. A number of manufacturers well known here and abroad have backed up the efforts of the exhibitors by substantial contributions to their war chest. Among these producers are the Gaumonts, Eclipse, Vitagraph, Itala, Ambrosio and the Sales Agency of Paris.

A new film-producing company, known as the Societé d'Edition Artistique Cinematographique, has just started on its career in Asnieres, near Paris. Their product will be released as Le Film Parisien.

BRITISH NOTES.

The first real objection to the Kalem religious masterpiece, "From the Manger to the Cross," has been raised by some religious body in the Scottish capital. Many newspaper controversies respecting this subject have been published from time to time, but hitherto they have not materialized. However, despite the efforts of the Puritans, the film was not withdrawn.

In anticipation of public taste favoring a distinction in censored and uncensored films, most of the American and British films, as a preface to their photoplays, attach a short length of film bearing a reproduction of the censors' certificate. One or two American makers, however, adhere to the conventional title in ordinary type. What I should term the neatest reproductions of the censorship certificate are those now preceding photoplays by Edison, Vitagraph and Essanay.

A case of unusual interest to the trade has just been decided in the King's Bench division. A British concern known as the Tyler Film Company sued Captain Webster for misrepresentation. The evidence showed that Webster took one of the company's operators on an expedition to the Arctic to take moving pictures in conjunction with the voyage of the Nimrod, but the defendants argued that their photographer had no suitable opportunities. Some of the evidence proved somewhat amusing, particularly when it was stated that the operator seemed more enthusiastic over hunting than photographing. Judgment was given in favor of Captain Webster.

Lord Roberts, the army "giant," had to call in the assistance of the moving picture the other day. He had to address a huge audience at Wolverhampton, and no hall in the place was large enough. Pictures were taken of his visit and his speech and shown to those who were crowded out of the building.

Commander Evans, of the Captain Scott Antarctic expedition, is on the way home with more polar pictures. These should be worth something, in view of the recent calamity, and no doubt Gaumont's will control both British and American rights.

Mr. L. G. Chiozza Money, the parliamentary statistician, is loud in his praises of the moving picture. This distinguished politician, who has on several occasions loomed large in American affairs, gave a list recently of one or two films which he thought magnificent. The American representatives were "Monte Cristo" (Selig), "As You Like It" (Vitagraph), and "Vanity Fair" (Vitagraph). Of the home produced films, Mr. Money is quite enthusiastic over "Lorna Doone." This latter subject should prove a little gold mine to the American exhibitor, as it is certainly in the front line of all British films.

I give the following statement (for what it is worth) from a London gentleman well known in the trade here: "It is to be regretted that America has now joined the Continent in sending us pictures which are open to criticism from a moral standpoint. The trade has hitherto looked upon American pictures as they have always looked upon British productions, as being clean and wholesome."

The average attendance at British picture shows is 28,000,000 people weekly. The number of picture houses involved is 6,000, with an invested capital of £13,000,000.

SUTCLIFFE.

NEW RAW FILM STOCK MAKERS.

The announcement of the appearance of a new raw motion picture film is an event in the motion picture world. The Fireproof Film Company, of Rochester, N. Y., makes its initial bow to the public in this week's number of the World. The company is located at Rochester, N. Y., within a stone's throw of the Eastman plant, the only other concern in this country manufacturing film on a large scale. The Fireproof Film Company was organized mainly through the efforts of H. Kuhn, formerly of the Defender Photo Supply Company, of Rochester, N. Y., and G. Cramer, president of the Cramer Dry Plate Works, of St. Louis, Mo., both of whom have had thirty years or more experience in photographic and allied industries.

Among the Picture Theaters

THE SUPERBA THEATER, GRAND RAPIDS, MICH.

ONE of the most attractive theaters in the country is the remodeled Superba. The theater is two and one-half stories high, and has a most elaborate front. The entrance is of marble, with mosaic floor. The entrance and exit doors are fitted with art mirrors and the woodwork is of mahogany. The box office is very spacious. The illuminating system is the "Eye Comfort" and magnificent candelabras grace the entrance, while the interior has a larger number of lights than are usually found, even in the newer houses. The house seats 550, and the seats were installed by the American Seating Company, all being in upholstered leather.

The house is steam heated and has a perfect ventilating system. The balcony is roomy with a center entrance, the stairway being of steel construction—in fact, every building restriction has been rigidly lived up to. The Superba was in reality designed by the managers of Nichols Brothers, in accordance with ideas they have long had in mind. A Power's No. 6 is the machine used. Three films are run each day and all changed daily. Four fine vaudeville acts are given and a four piece orchestra is engaged. Recently a Steck Grand piano was installed. The new theater cost $16,000 to rebuild, and as Nichols Brothers own the building it now represents an investment of some $50,000. Nichols Brothers have incorporated as the Superba Amusement Company. They started in Grand Rapids about six years ago and have made good from the start. In addition to the Superba they own and operate the Appolo in Grand Rapids, and also a theater in Flint, and another in Freeport, Ill. The Appolo is managed by F. D. Nichols, and the Superba by Geo. C. Nichols.

In the illustration, Messrs. Nichols are seen; also the handsome cashier. Business at the new house has been up to capacity right along and visitors from other cities all compare the new house most favorably with any other for the size in the country.

STAR THEATER, CHERRY VALLEY, NEW YORK.

The accompanying photo-engraving of the Star Theater, Cherry Valley, New York, which is owned and managed by Messrs. Pearson & Nelson, is located in a town where there are only seven hundred inhabitants. The Star has a seating capacity of six hundred, and has continued to play to good business ever since it opened on the fourteenth of September, 1912. Its patronage was especially good around the holiday season, and at a performance on Christmas night the managers sold seven hundred and fifty tickets and turned away about one hundred. This only goes to prove that a moving picture theater, even though it is situated in a small town, if properly managed, will make as much money for its owners as a picture house in a larger town.

As will be seen by the cut, the structure is built entirely of concrete. It was originally the village hall before it was bought over and converted into a picture theater by its present owners. Five hundred of the six hundred seats are on the parquet floor, and the managers do not allow any of the remaining one hundred balcony seats to be sold until the entire orchestra has been sold out.

Star Theater.

A Power's machine is installed in a fireproof booth. A five-horse power engine dynamo supplies the power and light, and the picture is projected on a screen fifteen feet square. Four large exits have been provided for.

BIJOU THEATER, PIERRE, S. D.

The Bijou Theater, of Pierre, S. D., a cut of which is herewith published, before it was converted into a moving picture theater by J. E. Hipple, was formerly the opera house of that city. In February of 1908, Mr. Hipple started the place as a moving picture and vaudeville house and has been well satisfied with the business since that time. Mr. Hipple had a new front built onto it this year. The dimensions of the interior are forty feet by ninety-seven feet, not including the stage, which is sixteen feet by forty feet. There are 606 seats in the auditorium. The theater is wired both for alternating and direct current, being equipped for city light and the theater's own generated electricity. Mr. Hipple says that the real estate upon which the structure stands is alone worth $25,000, and the equipment cost him $3,000. Some of the excellent appointments of the house are a sanitary drinking fountain, checking rooms and retiring rooms. The Bijou is steam heated and well supplied with electric exhaust fans.

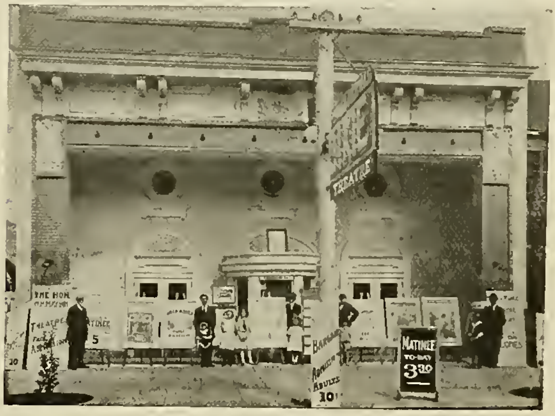
Mr. Hipple is not only owner and manager of the Bijou, but is also editor and publisher of a daily paper, and is interested in a printing company. Mr. Hipple was also at one time postmaster of Pierre, and let it be made known that he is the man who made the successful fight for the Sunday opening of picture shows in that city. Mr. Hipple in a letter to the Moving Picture World says that he is going to look after the interests of the exhibition business at the next legislature, as some local ministers and other persons are contemplating the introduction of bills looking toward a state censorship and other interferences with the picture industry.

THE NEW DIXIE THEATER, GULFPORT, MISS.

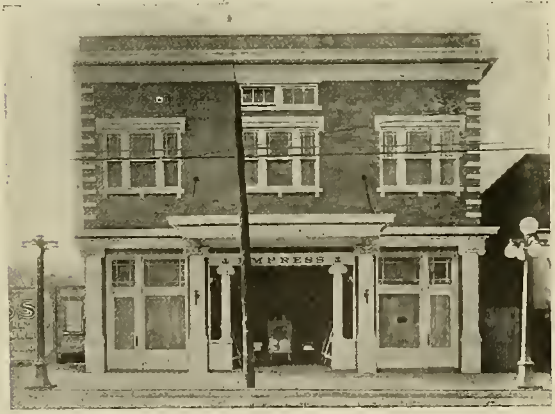
It is said that the picture lovers of Gulfport, Miss., know where to go when they want to see a good moving picture show, for invariably they all wend their way to the new Dixie Theater, situated on Twenty-sixth Street, an engraving of which is herewith published. It is known as the most beautiful house on the Gulf Coast between Mobile, Ala., and New Orleans, La. Fred Abbley, the manager and owner who is still a young man, was born on the Gulf Coast and has been six years in the picture business, three of which he has spent in Gulfport. Mr. Abbley, besides being the manager and owner of the new Dixie, is also national vice-president of the Ohio Moving Picture Exhibitors' League of America.



The Dixie Theater.

EMPRESS THEATER, OWENSBORO, KY.

The accompanying engraving is a picture of the Empress Theater, Owensboro, Ky., owned and controlled by George A. Bleich. A glance at the cut reveals its beauty, and if some existing picture houses were even half as neatly constructed as the "Empress," we feel sure that the patronage of those places would be materially increased. For indeed a theater with a poorly built and ugly front drives patronage away rather than invites it. Space forbids us to give representation to the interior views, which have been sent to us by Mr. Bleich. Suffice it to say that the interior is just as pretty as the exterior.

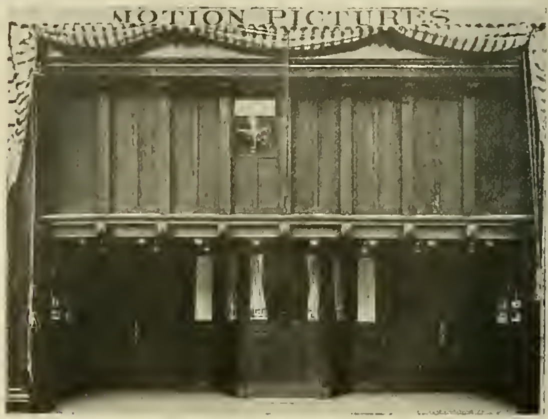


Empress Theater.

The dimensions of the "Empress" are 110 feet by 40 feet. The foyer and lobby are made of marble, tile and terrazzo. The indirect lighting system is employed. The seating capacity is 700, and the structure represents an expenditure of $26,000. Moving pictures form the programme, and a six-piece orchestra furnishes a suitable accompaniment to each entertainment. The admission price is ten cents. Mr. Bleich has had wide picture exhibition experience, having managed many other picture houses.

ELITE THEATER, CARTHAGE, MISSOURI.

The accompanying engraving is a picture of the Elite theater, Carthage, Missouri, which opened for business on March 18th, 1912, and has been enjoying the fruits of prosperity since that date. The dimensions of the building are twenty-five feet by one hundred feet. The lobby is illuminated with many hundreds of electric lights, giving it a very pleasing appearance. The box-office is painted in white. Among the employees is a neat appearing boy who not only helps in taking tickets, but runs errands for the patrons.



Elite Theater.

The operating booth is in charge of J. J. Bryne, whom Mr. Anderson, the manager, says is the best operator he has ever had or will ever have, for he will never let him leave his employ. He comes early in the morning and prepares for the evening show, which starts at seven o'clock.

The seating capacity of the theater is 334. Four reels of pictures are shown, for which an admission price of ten cents is charged. Pictures are changed four times a week. The Elite Theater Company, owners and managers of the Elite, is composed of A. L. Caulkins and M. W. Caffee, and Neal Anderson.

COZY THEATER, EL CAMPO, TEXAS.

The Cozy Theater, El Campo, Texas, cut of which is published herewith, was built by Mr. and Mrs. Charles R. Myer. It is also owned and managed by them. The dimensions of the building are 60 feet long by 43 feet wide. It is built of concrete and brick and is thoroughly fireproof in every way. It has a seating capacity of 354 persons. Music is provided by a Wurlitzer combination flute, piano and drums. The place is well ventilated and it is exclusively a picture house.

"When Thieves Fall Out" (Gaumont).

HERE is a story of intrigue in high life—and not only intrigue, but crime. It is a story of collusion between a banker and a lawyer to despoil a woman of her estate. In keeping with the station of the characters are the settings—nearly all interiors, some of them unusually elaborate. They are done in a manner characteristic of the Gaumont way, showing real stagecraft. The acting is excellent.

In the opening scenes we are introduced to Lawyer Raybard and his "companion," Dolores. The relationship as indicated is not without puzzling features at the time, but as the story unfolds we see that Dolores is a confederate, an accomplice, and when murder is committed it is not difficult to believe that she is an accessory before the fact. So it is safe to conclude that the term "companion" is a concession to American conservatism and that the title in the original French is not only more accurate, but definite.

Scene from "When Thieves Fall Out" (Gaumont).

The Countess of Croize has mortgaged her estate in order to raise funds to prosecute a search for the treasure which a former Croize had, according to rumor, 123 years before hidden from the revolutionaries. The interest has not been paid for more than a year. Banker Barrett, who holds the mortgage, engages Lawyer Raybard to go with him to the home of the countess, where she is informed of the impending foreclosure. Raybard, searching in the library, finds in a book the key of the hidden wealth. He and Barrett agree to buy the estate and divide profits. Barrett had previously told the countess that he could solve the situation by marrying her daughter, Madeleine, in love with Lieutenant Cross, then spending a furlough at the estate. When the discovery is made of the instructions, Barrett changes his mind about marrying Madeleine.

The lieutenant's leave expires and he takes train for Paris. Sharing the compartment with him is Dolores, who, on her arrival at her destination, asks the officer to help her to her home, but a short distance away, feigning illness. The lieutenant finds, after helping his traveling companion into the house, that he is locked in a room with a man lying dead on a bed. The officer escapes from the house, but is arrested when he tells of the crime that has been committed. The countess and Madeleine, on reading of the happening, hurry to Paris and engage a detective. The latter, in thrilling scenes, uncovers Raybard.

At the sale of the estate, Dolores is the highest bidder. The sale is interrupted by an order of the court and is postponed for 24 hours. The lieutenant, released from prison, appears and confronts Dolores. She is arrested. The key to the treasure, recovered by the detective, is found to be accurate. Madeleine and the lieutenant are married. The last scenes are of wedded happiness—showing the two riding horseback through the beautiful grounds of the estate.

STONE OPENS NEW PICTURE HOUSE.

J. W. Stone, manager of the Falls Creek Amusement Company, Falls Creek, Pa., recently opened the Star Palace Theater at Falls Creek. The new house has a seating capacity of 275 persons, and Mr. Stone is well pleased with the receipts since he opened the house.

Kinemacolor is coming to the front as a pictorial news reporter. After taking some snapshots at the St. Patrick's Day parade, the Kinemacolor Company was given the exclusive privilege of photographing the eighth anniversary celebration of the New York Hippodrome. The army of people employed in "Under Many Flags" paraded Broadway and Fifth Avenue in automobiles, with the "Kilties," the Clown Band and the Plunging Horses as special features. Kinemacolor caught them all in natural colors, and showed this topical film the following evening in all the New York theaters having Kinemacolor service.

THE accompanying cut is a true likeness of another one of the young fellows who has made good in the film business within the past few years. He answers to the name of Al. Lichtman, and is regarded as one of the best authorities on feature films. Before entering the film business, our friend Al. served his time with Uncle Sam, being stationed at Fort Leavenworth, Kan. After leaving the army the Exhibitors' Advertising Co., a Chicago firm, offered Lichtman a position as salesman, which was accepted for a short time, but it being a small company, with small prospects for him to look forward to, he decided to try his luck in the feature film game, which at that time had just begun. The Buffalo Bill and Pawnee Bill Film Co. secured Lichtman's services as publicity manager, and later advanced him to sales manager. His next berth was in the employ of the Monopol Film Co., where he acted in the capacity of general manager, until the formation of the Famous Players' Film Company, when Mr. Zukor put him in charge of the sales department of that company. Mr. Lichtman leaves this week for a trip through the South and West. We could say more of this young man, but the above will serve as an introduction in the many cities he visits, and he takes our best wishes with him.

Al. Lichtman.

Mr. L. A. Boening, secretary of the American Cinematograph Co., Chicago, paid a visit to the offices of the Moving Picture World during his recent stay in New York. Mr. Boening departed to his home town with several contracts for new studio equipment. In fact, he met with such success that he has decided to establish a New York branch.

After spending the past eight years in the exchange end of the moving picture business, "Hub" Taylor has decided to go into the business for himself, and with the assistance of two other partners has incorporated a company known as Forma, Terry & Taylor, for the purpose of handling feature films. As a starter, the new company has bought the New York State rights for "Tigris," a very strong detective story in four parts, released by the Itala Film Company.

With Taylor at its head, the new company is assured of almost positive success, for he is one of the most popular young men in the trade to-day, and possesses a variety of experience and ability second to none. "Hub" asked me to extend a cordial invitation to the trade to visit his new offices in 315 Fourth Avenue, New York.

Geo. L. Barrows, of the Berlin Aniline Works, New York, is leaving this week for an extended trip through the West.

Mr. Feist, the hustling special representative of the Kinemacolor Company, left his New York office for a two months' trip through the Western States.

Agnes Egan Cobb has resigned her position as manager of the Itala Film Company.

C. Lang Cobb wasn't pleased with the location the Ramo Film Company picked out for their offices on 31st Street, so he picked up his letter file and a few pencils and moved his offices to 101st Street and Columbus Avenue. Just like that fellow, he's never satisfied.

Ad. Kessel, of the New York Motion Picture Company, and J. H. Hallberg will compete for yachting honors this season. They have both bought new and high-powered motor boats.

Lorimer Johnstone has resigned his position as producer for the Selig Polyscope Company and is now connected with the Kinemacolor Company in Los Angeles.

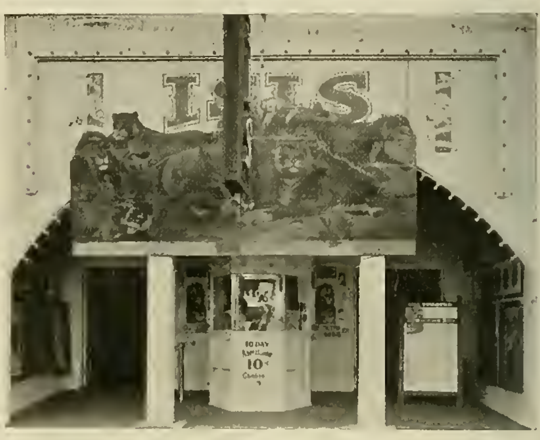
ISIS THEATER, TRINIDAD, COL.

The Isis Theater, of Trinidad, Col., was the first moving picture theater in Trinidad to introduce the five-cent admission price. The manager, Jack Nash, says that it was also the first theater in that State to give to its patrons three reels with a daily change; the first to present a spot-light soloist, and the only theater in Trinidad presenting licensed films.

The Isis, which is herewith given representation, has a seating capacity of 360, and charges an admission price of ten cents for adults and five cents for children. The place opens promptly every day at one o'clock and is open continually until 11 p. m. Mr. Nash says that he is the only manager in the city who keeps his theater open during supper hour. The music at the Isis is furnished by an orchestrion costing $1,950. A Simplex machine projects the pictures. The electric current, before it reaches the projection arc, passes through a mercury arc rectifier, which device changes the current from alternating to direct, thus insuring a steadier and brighter light.



Isis Theater, Trinidad, Col.

Mr. Nash pays particular attention to the cleanliness of his house. Every day it is thoroughly scrubbed and cleaned and fumigated. The air in the auditorium is changed every thirty seconds, making it possible for the patrons of the Isis to breathe pure air every minute during performances at the Isis. Special attention is given to children and ladies.

At the Sign of the Flaming Arcs.

By George Blaisdell.

HEARD a little story the other day which is most illuminating as to the methods of one of the screen's great directors—one who outside of film circles is rarely heard of; and inside is awarded the palm—by practically unanimous consent. This is pretty definite identification; but here goes: In the course of a rehearsal one of the young women—not now connected with this same company—was directed to take a knife and follow another player. The director was dissatisfied. The young woman did not manifest sufficient determination; there was an absence of the tragic, the murderous, in her expression. It was too much like a pink tea, not a contemplated assassination. There were repeated trials, and unbroken failures. The director's patience was exhausted in a flash. Like a bolt came the explosion. It began with an oath. "You are the rottenest actress I ever saw," he continued, his wrath steadily rising. "You are a disgrace to the company! When the scene is finished you are going to be 'canned'! Take the picture!"

The young woman never looked at the director. Apparently she couldn't wait for the cameraman to start cranking. The knife was poised at the proper angle; tears flowed from eyes that never before had shone with such a cold glitter and over a face that revealed real murder in the brain behind it—there was no room for doubt of that. The eye of the director never left the face of the raging actress; his anger had turned to fierce joy. As the scene ended he was at the side of the young woman.

"That's the way, girlie!" he shouted in his delight, as he gave her a resounding and fatherly smack on the cheek; "that's the way! that's just what I wanted!"

Ever hear of a photoplaywright diligently writing a scenario while at the same time unknown to him the identical story was being filmed? Epes Sargent may think this yarn belongs to him, but here's taking a chance on beating him out. At the recent photoplaywriters' dinner, one of the speakers advised writers to get in touch with the directors. One of his hearers thought the suggestion sounded so good that on the following Monday morning (the dinner was on a Saturday evening) he looked up a director. In the course of a conversation the visitor outlined a story he was thinking of submitting to a certain company.

"Don't take the trouble to do that," said the director. "I'll take your story now. Write it out and send it in to me."

Just after the departure of the caller the director received a telegram from his leading woman, away on vacation, in which she delayed her return for another week. Here was a pickle. No leading woman, no story in hand in which one would be unnecessary. The director thought of the plot as just outlined by his visitor, which bridged the emergency. He called in the scenario editor. In short order the script was handed in and work begun. The address of the scenario writer was not known to the director. He appealed to this writer to ask Sargent to notify the author and tell him his money was ready. In a day or two Epes found the missing author, who, however, refused to believe him. He knows now, nevertheless, that the chief coroner of the Inquest Club was right.

Picturegoers are losing another idol. One of the dearest, sweetest children that has graced the screen is "getting to be a big girl now." Adele De Garde was one of the many in Vitagraph's release of March 25th—"Dick, the Dead Shot." It should not be many years now before she comes back to us as a full-fledged actress. May she then be as unaffected and unspoiled as she was when doing her best child work!

George Terwilliger, well known in New York film circles, is leaving us for Lubinville, where he is engaged in scenario writing. Mrs. Terwilliger goes with him. Both will be missed. However, Philadelphia is not so far away.

Robert Leonard, who has been playing leads in one of the Rex companies, is to have a company of his own, as was pointed out last week by our Los Angeles correspondent. While he has been with the Universal but a very short time, his work has been such that it has been under observation at the exhibition room in 1600 Broadway right from the start. It is understood that Mr. Leonard will not leave the screen, but will play as well as direct.

* * *

J. Stuart Blackton, secretary of the Vitagraph Company, sailed on Saturday, March 29th, for an extended trip abroad, visiting England and the Continent. Mr. Blackton is seeking much-needed rest from business cares. Albert E. Smith, who for the past month has been sojourning in London and Paris, will return to the Brooklyn studio on April 9th. In the interim President "Pop" Rock will be at the wheel of the good ship Vitagraph.

Vivian Prescott, who has been a member of the Biograph Company and leading woman of the Imp, is soon to appear on the screen as a Lubin star. Miss Prescott has done some excellent comedy work; and she has also given us fine portrayals in serious drama. She will strengthen the Lubin forces.

How simple a story may pull at the heartstrings? Take, for instance, Biograph's release of March 24th—"A Welcome Intruder." This is a tale of a workingman and a lost motherless child—a little one taken into a strange home and one as humble as its own; more than that, it was taken into the heart of a woman. So thoroughly was it there intrenched that when the woman learned the identity of the child's father the lost one was restored only after a struggle between the child love in a lonely woman's bosom and the knowledge of what the little one meant to the sorrowing father. It would be difficult to say which of the two situations is the "big scene"—the restoration or the Christmas call of the father and child at the home of the woman friend and the significant action of the child in taking hands and forming the link between the two it so dearly loved. Claire McDowell as the woman gives a portrayal that will strike deep; it is real art. Charles Mailes as the father will add to his reputation. "A Welcome Intruder" is a picture not to be missed.

Let all of us who go to see pictures for pleasure or for business—and sometimes as the result proves for both—congratulate ourselves on the return of May Buckley to the screen. She has been missed. It is not often that we remember a player by the title of a picture. There are many players and many more pictures. In Lubin's "The Derelict's Return" Miss Buckley showed what she can do in straight drama; in the same company's "The Honeymooners" she gave us most delightful comedy. There were others aplenty, of course, but these alone were sufficient to demonstrate her quality and power.

George Larkin, formerly of the Eclair Company, is playing the lead in Farrell McDonald's Powers company, not "Billy" Garwood, as was erroneously stated in this column last week. The misstatement was made on the strength of what was deemed the best of information. Mr. Garwood is still with Thanhouser, and to the player and the company apologies are extended.

Ralph Earle, a Pathe representative, after two mishaps, is to make a third attempt to film Feather River Canyon, of Butte County, Cal.

The Sunday closing agitation seems if not on the increase at least to be holding its own in various parts of the country. A member of the Eau Claire (Wis.) Ministerial Association confidently predicts that every theater in that town is to be closed on the Sabbath. There are six shows in the place. In Georgia the Rome city council has refused to permit even religious pictures to be shown on Sunday. In Atlanta, after a long discussion, the managers have refused to close on Sunday, and are giving the proceeds of the box office—which are contributed voluntarily, by the way—to charity. The ministers say they will ask for the indictment of the exhibitors. The clergymen are not unanimous in opposing Sunday openings. Dr. C. B. Wilmer, of St. Luke's Episcopal Church, and a prominent divine, quotes the Bible in supporting Sunday opening. Also he says that "if you put on the wheels of a wagon too tightly the wagon will not run." Dr. Wilmer believes that the "Sabbath was made for the man and not man for the Sabbath." The Rev. John D. Winn, of the Church of the Incarnation, declared that he was made a member of the protest committee without his knowledge or consent. "I am not opposed to opening the motion picture theaters on Sunday," he says; "I favor legitimate amusements on Sunday. I do not believe the church should pose as a policeman." On March 13th the people of Atlanta showed by the most practical method what they think of Sunday opening. Here is a record of the count of the attendance at the theaters between 2 and 10 p. m.: Savoy, 6,318; Montgomery, 5,650; Alcazar, 5,570; Alamo, 5,147; Bonita, 4,833; Elite, 4,217; Superba, 4,146; Dutch Mill, 4,115; American, 4,110. Total, 44,106.

"THE WRONG ROAD TO HAPPINESS" (Patheplay).

Everyone at some time or another comes to the fork in the road of life where two paths stretch away down the years to come, each path making a plea to different emotions. Needless to say, the rough and rocky road, the right road, does not make as strong an appeal as the path that requires so much care to travel safely. In this two-reel Patheplay, released April 19th, a young and beautiful girl is forced to choose between these two paths and errs. The story is romantic, dramatic and pathetic, but does not involve any question of either ethics or morals. The girl, Jane Wilson, is loved by Jim Matthews, a young fisherman. The influence of Bob Miller, a salesman whose territory includes the fishing town wherein the story is laid, has imbued her with a desire to marry a man who would take her away from the quiet life of the simple quiet village to the brighter life of a metropolis which he represents. Jane's father forces her to consent to marrying Jim, but on the wedding day, when the townspeople are assembled for the ceremony, it is found that Jane has disappeared. She makes her way to the big city, where she marries the man of her dreams. For five long years Jane suffers silently from neglect that amounts almost to desertion. At last she seeks proof of her husband's deceit, and finds it. That night she leaves his house forever. Her father and Jim, who have never despaired of finding her, are at work on the seashore one day when they find the body of the girl who chose "The Wrong Road to Happiness." Don't forget the release date, April 19.

"THE SHERIFF'S WIFE."

An Indian never forgets, which was proven in "The Sheriff's Wife," a splendid Western dramatic photoplay teaching righteousness.

Kindness saved the sheriff and his wife, also a sack of gold which had been left in their care. Sewani, an Indian girl, tries to sell her wares, but is unsuccessful until she meets the sheriff, who purchases a pipe from her. This he presents to his wife as a keepsake. That afternoon, "Black Jake," a notorious outlaw, is captured and lodged in jail. A bag of gold is taken from him, which the sheriff gives to his wife to keep until the following day. That night, two worthless fellows try to steal the money. They first capture the sheriff, take him to a shed where they bind him. Sewani, not forgetting the sheriff's kindness, hearing his cries for help, frees him. The bandits are outwitted by the sheriff's wife, who hides in a trunk until the bandits lift the cover, searching for the hidden gold. The sheriff's wife covers them with a revolver, until the sheriff returns with a posse and the men are taken into custody.

Scene from "The Sheriff's Wife" (Essanay).

This production is booked for release April 9th.

NEW PICTURE HOUSE BEING BUILT.

H. H. Legg, J. F. McCulloch and Charles Miller recently formed and organized the North Side Amusement Company, of New Albany, Ind. It is the purpose of the new company to build and operate a $15,000 moving picture and vaudeville house at that city. The building the new theater is to be located in will have a frontage of sixty feet and a depth of 120 feet. The parquet floor will seat 700 and the balcony will accommodate 300. The lobby will extend twenty feet into the building from the sidewalk. It is Mr. Legg's intention, who is president of the new organization, to give nothing but first-run pictures and clean vaudeville acts. It is expected that the house will be ready for business around May 1st.

This new house has a seating capacity of sixteen hundred on the main floor. The building is of brick and cement and is fireproof throughout. Mr. John Keon is manager and proprietor and is well known as a pioneer of the moving picture business throughout New England, and on the opening night was the recipient of many beautiful floral pieces, among which was an eight-foot horse shoe from Salem Lodge No 8, B. P. O. Elks, of which Mr. Keon is a charter member. Standing room only has been the order since the opening.

THE HISTORICAL FILM COMPANY.

A newcomer into the film world is the Historical Film Company, with offices at 1 Madison Avenue, New York, and 4 Gerrard Street, Shaftesbury Avenue, London, W. The policy of the organization is releasing features of three and four reels based on American and English historical themes, for sale on the open markets and by state rights.

In addition, however, some unusual educational cinematography is under way, in conjunction with the great Eastern universities, to be used in college courses and for university extension work. The company is already at work on some anthropological work in recording the dances and customs of the old and the new generations of the Indians for the government records.

Eustace Hale Ball, General Manager Historical Film Co.

The company is under the general management of Eustace Hale Ball, well known in the film world as a prolific playwright and director for many companies, among which were Reliance, Solax, Majestic and Eclair. LUBIN HAS "FLOOD" PICTURE.

The Lubin Manufacturing Company will issue a full reel of the Dayton and Hamilton, Ohio, flood scenes. These pictures are said to be exceedingly interesting.

CORRESPONDENCE

NEW ENGLAND.

IT was recently announced by Mayor Fitzgerald, of Boston, after a conference with ex-Senator Powers, that he is seriously considering the withdrawal of his objection to the bill which proposes to allow Massachusetts photoplay theaters to show motion pictures for one hour before it is necessary to intersperse five minutes of some other form of entertainment. Under the present law moving pictures cannot be displayed for more than twenty consecutive minutes, and not again until five minutes of something else have intervened. The Mayor finds that officials of the Massachusetts Eye and Ear Infirmary believe that motion pictures are apt to impair the eyesight, but when the bill came up for hearing, however, the doctors in question failed to appear. The Mayor states that the senate committee in charge of this bill has agreed to hold it up until he is able to get some expert testimony on the matter. Massachusetts exhibitors have every reason to believe that the "hour bill" will pass, thanks to the activity of the Massachusetts Branch of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America, in showing that kinematography is not in the least harmful to the optics in its present state of mechanical perfection.

A new incorporation is the United Theaters, Inc., of Boston, a $50,000 corporation, with Lyndon H. Sullivan, Augustus L. Sanborn and Warren N. Withington as the promoters. Moving picture theaters are to be operated by the new concern.

The Massachusetts Chapter of the American Society of Heating and Ventilating Engineers went on record, at a dinner held at the Cafe Louis, Boston, as unanimously in favor of legislation providing for a minimum requirement of fifteen cubic feet per minute per occupant in the ventilation of theaters and moving picture houses. The chapter had as its guest Frank T. Chapman, chairman of the national society, of New York City, who strongly urged that Massachusetts adopt some law requiring a minimum ventilating space of fifteen cubic feet, and a minimum of four and one-third square feet of floor space per occupant, exclusive of passageway. The writer understands that the discussion was with special reference to the photoplay theaters, and that it was partly as a result of a wish expressed by General Whitney, of the Massachusetts State Police, that some comprehensive legislation be passed during the present session regulating the ventilation of photoplay theaters, by which the inspectors and district police could be definitely guided and controlled. Mr. Chapman stated that when it was taken into consideration that in New York City alone more than 300,000 people attend moving picture shows daily, and that in Boston at least 100,000 people attend daily, the vital necessity of proper ventilation of photoplay theaters could not be over-emphasized. Mr. Chapman stated that, in his opinion, very few Massachusetts photoplay theaters were properly ventilated. The writer's informant stated that those at the dinner agreed that the laws of Massachusetts are very stringent with regard to structural requirements of the building of operators' booths, but that the laws of the Commonwealth provided no definite provisions or directions by which inspectors and district police could be guided with relation to the ventilation of photoplay theaters. It was also remarked at the dinner that as a rule Boston picture houses have a larger seating capacity than have the New York theaters. The World has used much space in advising exhibitors that ventilation was an all-important point for the exhibitors to care for, and it now appears that those who did not heed the oft-repeated warnings will now be forced to attend to the ventilating of their theaters by law.

On Thursday, March 13th, the annual Auto Show banquet was held at the Copley Square Hotel, Boston. Among those present were Mayor Fitzgerald, of Boston, and John Bunny—you all know who the latter is!

E. F. Albee's Keith's Theater, Providence, R. I., will play stock company attractions this summer and spring, in place of the regular bills of vaudeville and pictures. April 7th is the date for the closing of the latter program.

Mayor White, of Holyoke, Mass., has appointed a theatrical censor for his city, in the person of Marshall Nickerson, who is very much on the job.

S. Z. Poli is building a theater in Springfield, Mass., that promises to be one of the finest in all New England, devoted to vaudeville and motion picture programs. Active work on the theater begins May 1st. The theater will be of steel construction, and the land on which it is to be erected is 200 by 100 feet. The auditorium will be 150 by 100 feet, and the stage 50 feet deep and 60 feet wide. A seating capacity of 2,000 is called for by the plans, including one balcony and a raised gallery. The house is to be very luxuriously appointed and will offer every modern convenience to its patrons.

H. I. Dillenbach, formerly manager of the Nelson Theater, Springfield, Mass., when this house was one of the S. Z. Poli chain, is now general manager of the Goldstein Bros. Amusement Company. Mr. Dillenbach has a very important position, as the Goldstein enterprises include a half dozen New England theaters devoted to vaudeville and pictures.

Jeff Callan, manager of Keith's Theater, Lynn, Mass., reports that the Edison talking pictures, which he showed in Lynn for the first time March 10th, were the hit of the year with him. The Kinetophone will be continued indefinitely.

Manager Al Newhall, of the Comique Theater, Lynn, Mass., was forced to close down his theater for a few days last week on account of a fire which burned out the wiring apparatus. The house is now open again and doing its usual capacity business, with good programs of pictures and songs.

William Hurley, manager of the Academy Theater, Lowell, Mass., is giving his patrons their fill of feature pictures.

Manager James Sheehan, of the Lyric Theater, Natick, Mass., has a hard story to tell these days. It seems that Vassar College has forbidden its girl students to patronize the moving picture theaters out in Poughkeepsie. As the Lyric is the nearest theater to Vassar College, this edict means the loss of much trade to Manager Sheehan. The following order was issued: "Vassar College students will aid the faculty in upholding the dignity of the institution by refraining from attending vaudeville and picture exhibitions in Poughkeepsie for the remainder of the term. Infractions of this rule will not be tolerated." Manager Sheehan is particularly put out, as he had arranged to exhibit the James K. Hackett films, showing "The Prisoner of Zenda" for the special enjoyment of Vassar students. The selectmen of Wellesley have never granted a license for a photoplay theater in that town. The Vassar faculty is behind the times.

I. W. Smith, of Lynch's Theater, Woonsocket, R. I., thinks that the Power's Cameragraph No. 6-A is just about the best ever, and has purchased two of these models, through the R. D. Marson Moving Picture Company, of Boston. Mr. Smith has no fault to find with the business of Lynch's Theater.

The action of the finance committee of Stoughton, Mass., in authorizing the purchase of a motion picture machine for installation in the auditorium of a local church was most creditable. The Stoughton News was well pleased, too, and remarked that the church people are to be congratulated upon this move, for the possibilities of the moving picture are limitless as an educational force.

What need is there of traveling when one can sit in an opera chair and see everything, from the building of the greatest canal in the world to actual scenes from real war? This opportunity is afforded in the Kinemacolor representation of "The Making of the Panama Canal" and "Actual Scenes of the Balkan War," which came to Tremont Temple, Boston, on March 17th, for a run of five weeks.

Earle B. Tinker, who operates the Dreamland Theater, Caribou, Me., has many good words to say of Manager Eslow of the Boston offices of the Mutual Film Corporation. During the recent strike on the Bangor & Aristook Railroad it was impossible to ship the Dreamland's Mutual program by rail. Manager Eslow shipped the reels by parcels post, and the Caribou house was not at all inconvenienced by the strike. The Dreamland is doing a very nice business, as are the various theaters operated by the Tinker motion picture enterprises.

Captain Foran has organized in Boston and other cities a club, to be known as the Adventurers' Club. In order to qualify as a member each applicant must give his experience as a war correspondent. E. H. Calvert, leading man for Essanay films, is one of the very few moving picture men to qualify. Mr. Calvert served during the Spanish-American War as correspondent for a Boston paper.

On account of the Massachusetts laws regulating film exchanges, which forbid any housing of films in any quantity in the business district, and then only in certain specified locations, the Kinemacolor Company of America has finally decided to establish its New England distributing plant in Providence, R. I., and not in Boston, as originally planned. Up to this time the New York offices of the Kinemacolor Company have handled its New England customers. Business has increased greatly in this territory, but the Kinemacolor folks could not find suitable headquarters in Boston that would pass the authorities. Providence, which is only one hour's train ride from Boston, was chosen, and offices are now being fitted up at 509 Westminster Street, in the very heart of that city.

William Fox's new theater at Bridgeport, Conn., devoted to vaudeville and photoplays, opened to excellent business. This house promises to be a winner under Fox management. A new Power's Cameragraph No. 6-A is projecting the pictures.

The Young Men's Christian Association of Worcester, Mass., has installed a moving picture machine and will give regular photoplay programs to stimulate interest among its members. No better means could be employed. The machine is a Power's, and was purchased through the Charles E. Schneider Company, of Springfield, Mass.

Five women, representing the National Congress of the Mothers' and Fathers' Club and the child welfare committee, recently made a thorough investigation of motion picture theaters in Boston, Mass. A lengthy report was issued, which is a complete victory for the theaters, and which shows that fairness is a characteristic of these organizations. The report stated that much of an educational value was found in the pictures that were seen in Boston theaters.

The Star Theater, Boston, has cut out the vaudeville from its programs, and is now showing a first-run service from the R. D. Marson Moving Picture Company of Boston, and illustrated songs.

On many occasions these columns have told of the really outrageous paintings and banners used by some of the Boston moving picture houses, in the belief that sensational paintings would bring in increased patronage. The writer was on the right track, as this week has surely demonstrated, when he hazarded the guess that the city authorities would take a hand in the game before very long. Scenes of suicide, murder and robbery will no longer be allowed to decorate the exterior of Boston photoplay theaters, according to the order issued by Mayor John F. Fitzgerald this week. In a letter to the management of these houses the Mayor declared the effect to be disastrous to the morals of young children, and ordered that no banner be displayed until his approval had been obtained. The letter reads as follows:

> Your attention is called to the continued and growing practice of displaying painted pictorial banners outside the entrances of many moving picture halls in this city that are licensed by me. These banners, etc., depict scenes of robbery, safe-breaking, stage robberies, murder, suicide and other crimes, with the result that the minds of the passers-by, particularly children, are excited.
> In view of the effect exercised upon the morals of the community by advertising of this character, I have this day ordered that notice be sent to the management of every moving picture hall, prohibiting the display of any painted banner at the entrance of these places of amusement unless the sketch or drawing of such banner has been submitted to me and approved.
> A violation of this order will be deemed a sufficient cause for the suspension or revocation of your license.

There can be no doubt His Honor has the right of the matter, and that conditions are as he represents. It will do the industry a great deal of good to have some of the Boston photoplay theaters clean house in this respect. It is a real pity that this method of advertising found its way into this city, as it is about the only point wherein the theaters are not up to the mark. The day following the Mayor's edict the Boston Journal came out with an editorial called "The Mayor and the 'Movies.'" The Journal says it is inclined to view the Mayor's attitude with much suspicion, because they feel that his action, which at first would appear to be a bona fide endeavor to protect the young from the criminal suggestiveness of the lurid banner or poster, is really "a hastily thought-out reform play." The Journal then goes on to say just exactly what these columns have often remarked on this matter, viz.: if the banners are bad, the show inside is worse. This is, in a nutshell, what the Journal takes half a column to say. The truth of the matter lies in the fact that the banners do not, by any stretch of imagination, truly represent the photoplays they purport to portray. Here's a sentence from the Journal's editorial, showing the attitude of that paper on this matter: "If the flat, lifeless advertisement is suggestive, how much more subversive of morals is the extraordinary mechanical ingenuity of the mobile drama thrown on the screen?" However, the editorial states, it does not believe that motion pictures do more harm than good, and believes that there is evident an ever-increasing tendency on the part of the manufacturers to raise the moral tone of the productions. The article closes by saying, "For the time being the matter can be left in their (the exhibitors') hands."

All Boston theaters, including moving picture houses, were closed on Friday, March 21st, in observation of Good Friday, from 12 to 3 p. m. This was in response to a request by Mayor Fitzgerald.

Moving pictures of flies and mosquitoes, showing them carrying typhoid and malarial germs, will be a feature of a health talk by W. H. Watters, M. D., professor of pathology in Boston University school of medicine, at Evans Memorial Building, Boston, on Tuesday, March 25th.

Massachusetts exhibitors bestirred themselves when John Bunny appeared at Keith's Theater, Boston, last week, and started a subscription for the great Vitagraph star. Mr. Bunny was presented with a loving cup, with the inscription, "Presented to John Bunny with the best wishes of New England photoplay exhibitors, March 15th, 1913. The presentation took place at a Boston hotel following a general good time. The presentation speech was made by Mr. Joseph Mack, president of the Massachusetts Branch of the Exhibitors' League. Mr. Mack, with his usual silver-tongued oratory, did credit to the exhibitors. Mr. Bunny was entirely carried away by the gift, but later rendered his thanks in his inimitable manner. All those present voted that they had had "a great time, and one long to be remembered."

Raymond W. Everhard is now treasurer of Keith's Hippodrome Theater, Portland, Me., Mr. Eberhard was formerly treasurer of the Lynn Theater, Lynn, Mass.

H. F. Gatchell reports that the new theater at South Portland, Me., has been doing capacity business since its opening performance, March 10th. Mr. Gatchell is managing the theater, which plays a straight program of photoplays.

I. M. Mosher, manager of Keith's Hippodrome Theater, Portland, Me., announces that he is now in line for the Edison talking pictures, as J. H. Blair, of the Edison company, has installed the apparatus. The coming of this novelty has been heavily advertised by Manager Mosher, who expects to cash in on the proposition. The Hippodrome is doing a very nice line of business, with vaudeville and pictures.

The Hudson Theater, South Main Street, Springfield, Mass., should be ready for its opening about April 1st, as the house is being rapidly pushed to completion. This theater is to be one of the best in Springfield and will have a seating capacity of nearly 1,000. It is of fireproof construction and is first class and thoroughly modern in every way. John Hudsoo, formerly of the Globe Theater, of that city, will be general manager of the theater bearing his name. When it is taken into consideration that Mr. Hudson is thoroughly familiar with what Springfield theatergoers demand in the way of vaudeville and pictures, and also that it has a fine location, it is easy to predict that the Hudson Theater should be a prosperous house.

The Ardell Theater of Springfield, Mass., is now being torn down. This house was one of the old store show type of photoplay theater, and could not withstand the competition of the larger and better photoplay houses, which give much more value for the money.

The Premier Theater, Fall River, Mass., reopened to the public on March 24, so changed for the better that no one would recognize the new house as the old Premle. Very extensive alterations have been made. The policy is vaudeville and pictures, as usual.

The Columbia Theater, Taunton, Mass., is now in the hands of painters and carpenters, who are making some needed improvements. It will reopen very shortly, playing to vaudeville and pictures, as formerly.

Hartford, Conn., will soon have another theater, built for vaudeville and pictures, as a house is now under construction in this city.

A recent incorporation is the Inter-City Amusement Company of Brockton, Mass. Andrew Gazneau, Amos M. McLean and John F. Casey are the promoters, who incorporated for $25,000.

Charles E. Schneider, known to all the New England trade as a moving picture man, has moved from one side of Main Street, Springfield, Mass., to the other, and is now located at Number 257. among other things, Mr. Schneider is now agent for 'ower's Machines, and reports excellent business, including his Lyric Theater, that gives programs of quality photoplays.

Mayor Dennison, of Springfield, Mass., has made a reduction in the price of licenses for photoplay theaters. Fifty dollars is now the price for moving picture houses, instead of $75, the former price.

Marion Leonard is still a great favorite with the photoplay fans. This was shown when the Monopol feature "As in a Looking Glass," was featured in the Star Theater, Boston, this week.

Messrs. Cunney & Hodgkins, of Boston, have secured a five-years' lease of Sheedy's Theater, Brockton, Mass., and have closed the house down to make some needed renovations and improvements. The theater will have new seats before it is reopened. It is understood that the lease gives Cunney & Hodgkins the privilege of purchasing the theater after one year if they desire. Pictures and illustrated songs is to be the policy. There is no reason why this theater should not prosper under the proper management. Mr. Charles Petford, the former manager of Sheedy's, has accepted a position at Woonsocket, R. I., where he will take charge of the Woonsocket Opera House, which plays pictures and songs. Manager Petford bears the reputation of being a capable worker.

John Morris, a special officer at the Unique Theater, Washington Street, Boston, was arrested by detectives from headquarters last Saturday, charged with the theft of $23 worth of admission tickets. Manager Alden Washburn, of the Unique, is most enthusiastic over the film service he secures from the R. D. Mason Moving Picture Company of Boston, and is doing the business with this program and illustrated songs. Mr. Washburn is also the secretary of the Massachusetts branch of the Exhibitors' League.

Matt. Saunders, formerly in charge of a Wilkes-Barre theater, has been transferred to the Plaza Theater, Bridgeport, Conn., where he is making good with large bills of vaudeville and pictures.

On Sunday night, March 30, the Majestic Theater, Boston, a "legitimate" theater, will present the moving picture, "Life of St. Patrick," which will be lectured upon by Peter S. McNally. Prices will be twenty-five and fifty cents.

Manager Jacob Lowrie, of the Beacon Theater, Boston, is often out of town these days. No one knows just where he is, but it is safe to say that the astute Jake is looking for "propositions," which is only another way of saying that before long the folks that operate the Beason will add another house or two, to their growing chain of theaters, all of which are under Mr. Lowrie's able guidance.

The Massachusetts Branch of the Exhibitors' League of America has opened its new Boston headquarters, at 25 La Grange street. The first showing of advance releases at headquarters was made by the General Film Company, on Monday, March 24. The following day Universal films were shown. The headquarters is a great step forward for the Massachusetts Branch, and, with its many undoubted conveniences, should be an added incentive for every live exhibitor in this territory to become a member.

On Monday, March 31, the Boston offices of the Mutual Film Corporation, took on another first-run house, the Star Theater, of Boston. The house was landed by George I. Appleby, the Mutual's well-known salesman. The Star contracted for first-run service with three changes each week. The R. D. Marson Moving Picture Company had been serving the Star.

These people have appealed to Mayor Scanlon to stop the exhibitions of moving pictures and vaudeville shows. The mayor has announced that he will meet the protesting citizens and will hear what they have to say on the subject. For some time past Sunday shows have been the regular thing at Lawrence, the great majority of which were moving picture exhibitions.

Business is brisk at Marcus Loew's new Boston theater, the St. James. The regulation Loew show of vaudeville and pictures is given. A feature of the program is the Song Demonstrators' Contest, when the music publishers present their new songs. The audience is the judge, and the song receiving the most applause wins the prize—a loving cup.

The Boston "Globe" editorially comments on Dr. Hall Edwards' remarks at the International Congress of Physiotherapy, now in session at Berlin, Germany. Dr. Hall explains the value of the kinematographic views of the digestive organs of the human system at work. There is no doubt but that moving pictures of this nature would do more to promote health in this country than all the scholarly lectures on hygiene.

On Saturday night, March 29, the Hub Theater, Boston, Mass., came to the end of a prosperous career as a vaudeville and picture house, as the theater has been purchased, and will be used as a Yiddish drama house. George I. Appleby, of the Boston offices of the Mutual Film Corporation, announces that he has closed contracts with Boylen's Theater, Taunton, and the Scenic Theater, of Haverhill, both of which will exhibit Mutual service.

Manager Dean, of the Hartford Theater, Hartford, Conn., gave a free entertainment one afternoon last week. The special guests were the 100 odd members of the General Assembly, who were initiated into just what a Sunday evening picture show consisted of. Fred P. Dean was anxious that the legislators should realize just how innocent and instructive is the ordinary Sunday photoplay show, and from every report, he succeeded admirably. Manager Dean deserves the appreciation of Connecticut exhibitors for this special matinee, as there is nothing like showing the legislators what is what!

ILLINOIS.

THE ten-cent admission in Decatur was short-lived. Manager Sigfried of the Bijou, raised the price from five cents, but evidently found it unsatisfactory and reduced it with the announcement that despite the lower rate, there would be no change in the policy inaugurated with the ten-cent show.

What's in a name? Some Illinois managers evidently think there is everything, for Manager Thomas Prosser, of St. David, is willing to discard the Lyric's title in favor of Dreamland. Jones, for the petitioners, announced that the matter would be taken before the Supreme Court.

Manager Shoaff, of the Shoaff Opera House, at Paris, recently announced an educational program in the interest of the churches, missionary societies, clubs and schools, but was disappointed in the worn films he received and cancelled the last two shows. The moving picture theater owners of Rockford started one of the most sensible campaigns for Sunday shows that has ever been conducted. As soon as a majority of the registered voters of the city has signed petitions asking for a legal expression at the polls the photoplay houses united in a two-column advertisement in one of the local papers. This was in the form of a pledge to the people of Rockford and was signed with facsimiles of the managers' autographs. In addition to promising to obey all laws—and to go farther—in the matter of hours, order, sanitation and safety, they promised: "We will conduct our places not in competition to the valuable work done by the churches or in opposition to any religious endeavor, but rather as an auxiliary force for good. It shall be our aim to display only such motion pictures as have passed a vigorous censorship and nothing low, vulgar or degrading will ever be shown. We have no desire to extend this privilege if granted by the people, to Sunday vaudeville, as we have no interest in any other form of entertainment offered in this city. We will welcome suggestions from religious bodies, if this privilege is granted, and try so far as lies within our power to co-operate with them in improving and elevating our enterprise. We invite, those who oppose motion pictures on Sunday, many of whom are doubtlessly unfamiliar with the great progress made in film production, to visit our places, confident that they will be surprised at the clean and instructive enjoyment they will find there."

A committee of ten has been appointed to arrange a system of programs, both for class work and for the general public and to pass upon films. The city superintendent is chairman and the members are from the ministerial association, the general community and the school body. The Parents' Guild of Lincoln School in Mattoon is considering the picture machine seriously and has begun to raise a fund for that purpose.

The Reliance Manufacturing Company, of Mattoon, is using moving pictures in programs which it gives to its employes. The meetings are designed to bring about 400 persons into closer co-operation.

SPRINGFIELD, ILL.

SPRINGFIELD photoplay houses figured in the Blue Sunday War, planned by Meat Cutters Union No. 74 to open Sunday March 23. The Illinois Supreme Court recently held that an ordinance closing the meat markets on Sunday was legal, the question originating in Springfield. The union is said to have announced its intention of closing on the date mentioned, every business house in the city except those which are absolute necessities. This they proposed to accomplish by swearing out warrants for owners of places kept open on Sunday, and then if the county and city prosecutors fail to act to ask for an injunction restraining the business houses from opening on Sunday.

Springfield men are the incorporators of the Central Motion Picture Company, which has been incorporated with a capital stock of $1,000 for the purpose of buying up houses all over the State of Illinois and operating them under the syndicate plan. Herbert Woods, county recorder, and W. H. Ogle and I. C. Davidson are the incorporators.

The two local houses, the Lyric and the Vaudette, which added a reel to their show and raised their price to ten cents, have not suffered any disastrous effects to date. It is granted that the increase may send some customers to the cheaper houses, but on the other hand it has been accepted as invitation to the better class of patronage and is generally regarded by the public as a declaration by the managers that they are anxious to maintain dignified houses.

Rev. Frederick W. Burnham, pastor of First Christian Church, went even further than endorsing the Kalem picture "From the Manger to the Cross." When he found that W. W. Watts of this city, who has the Illinois right, had an open date for Sunday March 16, he leased the film for the evening service, and make arrangements to give the lecture himself. As the church has a splendid organ an unusually fine evening, free, for the congregation was possible. Harry Thornton who has been booking this picture in Illinois for the Vaudette Company has taken charge of the No. 1 set of reels. Arthur Simons who was managing the No. 1 show has gone out with the second set. The Sheldon fire department, which operates a moving picture house, has booked the picture. A date at Sullivan was cancelled because of smallpox. Among the houses which have recently booked the picture are: Majestic, Mattoon; Cosy, Shelbyville; Variety, Staunton; Fellis Opera House, Hillsboro; Pittinger, Centralia; Star, Mt. Carmel, Lyric, Robinson; Opera house, Mt. Sterling; Lyric, Moline; Grand, Sterling; Princess, Freeport; Rockford Picture Parlor, Rockford; Haish Auditorium, Dekalb; Star, Aurora; Dawn, Streator and Colonial, Joliet.

Little opposition has been shown to the Denver bill in the Illinois legislature which provides for a board of examiners for moving picture shows, and it nearly came out of the senate committee on snap judgment March 13. It was claimed, however, that there was not a quorum present and that not all the members of the committee had been notified of the meeting and Lieutenant-Governor Barratt O'Hara ordered it sent back into committee.

The Central Motion Picture Corporation, of Springfield, which was incorporated with a capital stock of $1,000, has opened an office at 504 I. O. O. MIDWEST SPECIAL SERVICE.

LOUISVILLE.

THE Edison kinetophone has made its appearance in Louisville, B. F. Kieth's vaudeville house presenting the latest device of the inventor to the public. Largely speaking, it may be said that the Louisville patrons of the theater enjoyed the talking pictures, even though some expressions of disappointment were heard. Devotees of the animated pictures, perhaps, had been led to expect too much, and the performance therefore fell a bit beneath anticipations. One of Louisville's amusement companies is now negotiating for the local rights of the kinetophone, and one of its houses will shortly be devoted to the talking pictures.

David Levinson, manager of the Novelty Theater, has installed motors in his operating room, being the first exhibitor of the Gateway City to take that step. Mr. Levinson is more than pleased with the results of the motors, asserting that an all-round improvement has been effected. Other Louisville exhibitors have spent much time at the Novelty in looking over the motors, and many will follow suit in the near future.

Beverly B. Dobbs has been in Louisville, holding forth at the Masonic Theater with motion pictures entitled, "Atop o' the World in Motion." Mr. Dobbs himself disdains the title of motion pictures, calling his possessions a "tourographolog." He gave two performances daily, showing at the Masonic during an entire week. Good crowds witnessed the performances, apparently taking much pleasure in the views of Alaska.

William L. Hibbitt has resigned the management of the Olympic Theater, of Louisville. Mr. Hibbitt has been succeeded by Joseph Goldberg, formerly press agent for Hopkins Theater. Mr. Goldberg has been prominent in the theatrical field for several years. It is believed he will be able to fill Mr. Hibbitt's place to the satisfaction of all concerned.

Joseph & Joseph, a well-known firm of architects, have been employed by the Broadway Amusement Company to draw plans for the new East Broadway Theater, which is to go up on the site of the present house at Shelby Street and Broadway. A theater to seat between 1,500 and 1,800 people is being planned, to rival the most modern and beautiful in the South. The exact date of beginning the work is problematical, but will probably be some time during the coming summer. The Broadway operates five houses, including the Ideal, considered the most modern in Louisville. The company has continued to run vaudeville, one stock company now concluding an engagement of fifteen weeks.

Stockholders of the Hippodrome Theater Company will meet early in April for the purpose of voting on expenditures for needed improvements. Manager Max Simon is anxious to enlarge his seating capacity, and the shareholders are expected to approve his judgment.

The Manring Theater, of Middlesboro, Ky., has been improved by the addition of a mirror screen. The acquisition has operated favorably on the pictures.

The new Ben Ali Theater, of Lexington, Ky., is rapidly nearing completion, having reached the stage where decorators have been put in charge. The playhouse, which will probably be devoted to "legitimate," is to be opened in April, according to present plans.

M. A. Neff, president of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America, was the chief speaker at a luncheon held by Cincinnati, O., exhibitors recently. The M. Switow Amusement Company, capitalized at $100,000, has filed articles of incorporation. The company's headquarters will be located in New Albany, Ind. Michael Switow, now president of the Falls Cities Amusement Company, also will head the new concern. Mr. Oldham has been prominent in motion picture circles for some time, as the owner of the rights of "Mammoth Cave."

William Bakrow, of Cincinnati, was a recent visitor in Louisville, where he purchased equipment for the Opera House at Harrodsburg, Ky. The theater is to be opened to motion pictures in the near future, Mr. Bakrow having leased the house. It will seat about 900 people. Standard projection machines have been purchased. Alterations in the theater have been completed and other arrangements completed for the opening of Harrodsburg's new phototheater.

Legg is president, while J. F. McCullough is secretary-treasurer. The company will be capitalized at $15,000. The new house will be ready for business by mid-summer, according to present plans.

The National Moving Picture Company, recently formed in Louisville for the purpose of erecting motion picture theaters in Kentucky and other states, is to begin work on a house at Central City, Ky., shortly, it is announced. That town now has but one animated picture theater, the Empress, conducted by the Consolidated Theaters Company.

The Star Theater, of Lexington, Ky., has been closed permanently by the Colonial Amusement Company, which has operated it for the past two years. The erection of a new skyscraper on adjoining property has so cut off the house from patronage that it was deemed advisable to close it altogether. The Colonial is now erecting a $10,000 motion picture theater in Richmond, Ky., and will put Slaughter Sparks, who has managed the Star in that town, as head of the Alhambra.

T. S. Henderson, of the Industrial Film Company, of Chicago, is in Paducah, Ky., and will take moving pictures of the manufactories of that city, to be used in exploitation of the town's resources.

Plans have been completed for the Auditorium Theater, to be erected at Dawson Springs, Ky., at once. The seating capacity of the house will be 1,000, while the cost is estimated at $10,000. The structure will be ready by June 1. The Kentucky Pharmaceutical Association, which will hold its annual convention in Dawson Springs, beginning June 1, will use it for a week. The theater will be devoted to vaudeville and moving pictures. Dawson Springs is a popular summer resort, thousands of folk from Kentucky and adjoining states spending the summer there to obtain the benefit of the waters. W. I. Hamby is president of the company, which is arecting the theater.

Malcom and John Weisiger, heavy property owners of Danville, Ky., are contemplating the erection of a big play house in that city. The two men recently inspected Louisville's theaters, and were favorably impressed. If erected, the house will be one of the handsomest in Kentucky.

The strike of motion picture operators and musicians in Louisville has come to an end, an agreement having been reached between the strikers and the Louisville Photo-Play Association, composed of eighteen houses in the Kentucky metropolis. The union men will return to work at once, the exhibitors agreeing to find places for as many as possible. This does not mean, however, that the operators who worked during the strike will be dismissed without consideration. Those who care to join the union will be accepted by that body, provided they can pass the examinations. The two weeks' clause, which was the original cause of the dispute, is to be retained. Exhibitors, therefore, will have the privilege of terminating the contracts between themselves and the operators and musicians with two weeks' notice. Members of the union who went back to work before the settlement of the strike, and who were fined $100, have been taken back by the union, with the fine pending. The agreement by which the union men will return to work was reached at a meeting at which the three factions were represented. Louis J. Dittmar, David Levinson and Fred Dolle represented the Louisville Photo-Play Association; E. J. Elliott and B. Miller spoke for the musicians, and Jack Johnson was on hand for the operators. The settlement of the strike is gratifying to all concerned. While the theaters in the business district have not suffered, a few of the houses in union residential sections have been hurt by the disagreement. A general improvement in business is expected.

The old Avenue theater, on Fourth street, which is at present the home of moving pictures, will be converted into a five-and-ten-cent store next summer. The lease now held by Morton Shaw expires on July 1, and the old building will be remodeled for an up-to-date mercantile house. Judge W. Allen Kinney, of the Princess Amusement Company, who had secured a lease on the theater, has sold his option. E. D. Stair, a well-known theatrical magnate of Detroit, has held a lease on the Avenue for ten years. The old theater was for years the home of melodrama, all of the thrillers showing there. Since its conversion into a moving picture theater it has been extremely successful. Its passing is regretted by many motion picture men, the history of the old structure being a part of the story of photo-play development in Louisville.

Louis J. Dittmar, manager of the Majestic theater, leased the Arcadia at Fourth and Broadway with the intention of using it for a dance hall. The Arcadia contains 18,000 square feet of floor space and will be the finest establishment of the kind in Kentucky. A projection department is to be installed shortly by the Central Film Service Company, of Louisville. The new department will have quarters in the Tyler building. An hour each morning will be devoted to the exhibition of features and other pictures. Films which are considered to be doubtful in morals or some other feature will be thrown on the screen before the exhibitors. A Standard No. 4 machine will be used, together with a radium gold fibre screen. The Standard will be motor-driven. A 5 by 7 picture will be shown. A. F. Mayer will be in charge of the department.

S. W. Linebaugh, a well-known real estate man of Russellville, Ky., has opened a motion picture theater at that place, the house having a seating capacity of 600. Four reels of Universal pictures will be shown daily. The house is a new one, and is located on Main street.

The Woodland Amusement Company, whics will conduct an airdome in Louisville, has filed articles of incorporation, the capitalization being $2,000. Alf. V. Oldham is to head the company, other interested being William Smith and Henry J. Tilford.

L. H. Ramsey, of the Hippodrome and Annex theaters, of Lexington, Ky., has concluded an agreement whereby he will show Kinemacolor in the Fayette city. Kinemacolor has heretofore had no representative in Lexington, and the public of that city will get its first glimpse of the "natural color" pictures at Mr. Ramsey's houses. Mr. Ramsey has changed his mind about retiring from the field. A couple of months ago he announced that his holdings were on the market. The exhibitor was at that time disgusted with the cry being raised against Sunday shows. This has died away, and Mr. Ramsey, one of the veteran exhibitors of the city, has regained his equanimity and is planning improvements for his houses.

Francis X. Bushman was a visitor at the Colonial theater, Lexington, Ky., recently, giving lectures in connection with the presentation of a film in which he was the star.

Rodney C. Davis, of the Kozy theater, of Paducah, Ky., is leading a "home products campaign" in that city, throwing the slogan, "Paducah for Paducah in Paducah," on his screen at each performance. Business men have adopted the slogan, which is appearing on letter-heads of local concerns.

"On Fortune's Wheel"

Two Reels, April 11

Dramatic and Military Sensation

The bank president loots the crashing institution, taking for himself the remaining funds. Through a chain of circumstantial evidence the cashier is charged with the crime and sentenced to the penitentiary. His wife suffers from poverty and is compelled to part with her baby, which is adopted from the orphan asylum by a wealthy family. Years later the girl meets the son of the thief, whose father has changed his name, and the young people fall in love. The cashier escapes from prison and meets his persecutor in the West, where a fierce struggle takes place. The guilty man escapes, but is captured by Indians whom he has wronged, and who lash him to the wheel of a stage coach and execute him.

JONES GOES SHOPPING (April 14).—Late in the afternoon Jones, a business man, remembers his wife's commission to buy her some cloth. He rushes madly to the nearest department store, where he is directed by the floor-walker to a counter, where his troubles begin. It is bargain day and a big sale is on. At first no one pays any attention, but he is finally waited on by the clerk, who after taking down almost everything in sight, fails to match the sample and sends him to another counter. In his anxiety to secure the goods before closing time, he rushes all over the store, gets into the ladies' underwear and millinery department, has a rumpus with the elevator boy, and continues to grow wilder, creating a disturbance wherever he goes. At last in the china department, where his excited and expostulating manner makes the shoppers smile and cash girls giggle, he literally loses his head entirely, and in a fist fight with the floor-walker, smashes everything in sight. The flying china ware makes everyone hike for shelter. For a few minutes he is master of the situation, but the police arrive and drag him bodily from the store, fighting, disheveled, still demanding a match for his sample.

THE ROCKY MOUNTAINS IN WINTER (April 14).—Among the Rocky Mountains in winter, the snow and pine-clad hills and valleys form one of the most beautiful and awe-inspiring sights of the world. The clear, cold air and high altitude bring out in minute detail and spectroscopic beauty the wonderful scenery. Among subjects included are the beautiful scenery of the Pikes Peak region, with the trip to Cripple Creek. From here one can see the unfolding scenery of the Rocky Mountains. Also the wonderful and picturesque Cheyenne Canyon and Colorado Springs and Manitou, and the activities of the people there in winter. Here we see people enjoying all the sports of summer with the cold, white hills rising about them and serving as a most picturesque background.

THE NEW PUPIL (April 15).—Henri, a young composer and violinist, attends a gathering at the studio of Jack, an artist, in an apartment house. He is sent out to get some eatables and on the way back blunders into the room of a young lady, who becomes the ideal of his romantic heart. She is a music teacher, and failing an introduction, he becomes her pupil. But she has seen his picture and an interview in a newspaper in which he criticizes American women for the way in which they run after stage celebrities. She pretends ignorance of his identity and sternly refuses to allow any sentiment. One day she surprises him while playing one of his own compositions, and with pretended indignation taxes him with his identity. He tells her he has done it because he loves her, but she shows him the interview in which he has voiced his opinion of American women. Finally, however, she relents and all ends well.

VITAGRAPH.

MR. MINTERN'S MISADVENTURES (April 14).—Madison Mintern, is crossed in love. He goes to Europe. Muriel Leach, also crossed in love, and hating men, takes passage on the same boat. Trapper, a detective, also a passenger, is in search of a thief and absconder, Harry Green, who is supposed to be on the same steamer. Mintern's description agrees with that of the absconder, and the fact that he keeps in his cabin and has most of his meals sent there, serves to confirm Trapper's suspicion tha he is Green. He gets the cabin next to him and watches. One night Muriel and Mintern both seek the upper deck for solitude and are disgusted at each other. Muriel sprains her ankle and Mintern assists her. They become rather interested in each other. That night, when he is going to his stateroom, a storm switches off the electric current. Searching for his room, Mintern enters Muriel's cabin by mistake. The lights are suddenly turned on, she sees him and before he can explain, screams for help. Trapper, on the watch, arrests him as Harry Green. Luckily Mintern meets his friend, Mallery, on board, who vouches for his identity. He and Muriel become friends and resolve to help heal each other's broken hearts.

THE FORTUNE (April 15).—Jake and his wife are at the county fair. The one thing that attracts Jake's attention above all others is a fortune-teller's sign. He is told by the seeress that he will be immensely rich some day. To celebrate his expected fortune, Jake gets drunk. An automobile party of four young bloods happens into the cafe and Jake tells them, when he falls heir to his riches, he will enjoy himself to the limit and do things in style. On his way home he falls asleep by the roadside.

The four young sports whom he met in the saloon, happen that way, and upon seeing his condition, they decide to play a joke on Jake and test his ability to make good in his boasted promise to do things in style. They carry him to the automobile and take him to their swell apartments, put him to bed and then dress themselves as valets and maids. Later in the day, Jake wakes up and discovers himself in the midst of luxury.

The next morning, Jake wakes up, finds himself back where he started before going to the fair. He is convinced he has been dreaming, and he is sure of it when his wife comes into the room, administering to him a wholesome beating with her trusty old broom.

AFTER THE HONEYMOON (April 16).—After the honeymoon Ethel and Jack show their real dispositions. Jack complains about the breakfast which Ethel has prepared. They have a quarrel. He goes to his business completely upset. She decides to take a position, make her own living. Jack looks in the newspaper and picks out a boarding place, where he secures board. He is given the only vacant room in the house. Ethel secures a position as a cashier in a quick lunch restaurant, then she answers the same ad as her husband and the landlady sees a chance to rent the same room to Jack and Ethel. Ethel's position as cashier keeps her busy at night, therefore, she cannot occupy the room except in the daytime, and Jack can only occupy it at night. Jack comes home at night and discovers a woman's belongings in the room, and tosses them upon the floor. He leaves for his office in the morning, and after he has gone Ethel returns from the restaurant and finds her bureau and wardrobe filled with men's attire. She calls the landlady, who removes Jack's things.

The young wife begins to tire of her position as cashier, and Jack is disgusted with the condition of things. Ethel, who has already started for the restaurant, resigns her position and goes back to her lodgings. She enters the room and is horrified to see a man occupying it. She walks boldly to him and both look imploringly at each other, and finally both confess that they are sorry for their disagreements, and are anxious to make up and live happy ever afterward. Eagerly they kiss and are reconciled.

SLEUTHING (April 17).—Ophelia cannot reconcile herself to a separation from Wallie, and she induces him to continue as a boarder in her home. The faithful Belinda accidentally learns that Wallie is receiving scented notes, and other feminine reminders, which arouses her suspicion. Belinda is filled with a determination to save her mistress from the gay deceiver. She disguises herself in male attire.

Miss Ophelia goes to the bank to make a deposit and Wallie falls in line directly behind her. His financial condition is at low ebb and he desides to lay siege to Ophelia and her hoarded wealth. He loses no time in proposing to her and she accepts him. He confesses that he cannot purchase an engagement ring, and she gives him her diamond ring, which he says he will present to her in the presence of witnesses in the evening. He pawns the ring, buys a fake diamond in its stead, pocketing the difference. He meets a chorus girl and takes her to a swell restaurant. Belinda is on his tracks. She has seen him pawn the ring and meet the chorus girl. She follows him to the restaurant, where she creates a scene. Hughie, the policeman, arrests her. She pleads with him. He sympathizes with her and becomes quite smitten. He takes her to the station house and intercedes for her. The sergeant discharges her and Hughie induces the matron to furnish Belinda with a hat and dress to make a presentable appearance upon the street.

Wallie comes back to Ophelia, who makes preparations to get married. With a cute little titter, she leaves the house, leaning on Wallie's arm. After they have gone, Belinda comes into the kitchen with Hughie. The cook tells her Ophelia has just gone to the Register's Office to get married. Belinda looks at Hughie in surprise, grabs him by the hand and is just making her way out of the kitchen, when Dowling, the grocer's boy, comes in. She gives him a withering glance, pushes him aside, and dashes out, pulling Hughie after her. Dowling follows them. Belinda and Hughie hasten to the Register's Office. Dramatically Belinda holds up her hands and cries, "Stop!" She pulls out the evidence of Wallie's deception and forbids the marriage. As Ophelia hears her tell about the pawning of the ring, she recovers herself and commands him to return the diamond. Wallie hands it over and she discovers that it is a fake. This is too much for Ophelia, she falls in a faint. Wallie makes his escape. Belinda rushes to her assistance and Dowling tries to help her, but Belinda commands him to go, then turns with a sweet smile to Hughie, in loving preference. Ophelia is supported

She meets Wentworth Dryden. He is charmed by Marion's manner and personality. She finds him very entertaining. Dryden pays her so much court her husband notices it. Dryden conducts himself with propriety and shows Mrs. Harrington every respectful courtesy, but he finds it difficult to restrain his admiration for her. He invites her to visit his brother's studio, to which he has a passkey. After viewing the works of art, Dryden expresses his love for her and she becomes suspicious of his intentions. Making some plausible excuse, she opens the window. She spies her husband, attracts his attention and calls him. He is surprised, but hastens to her. She calmly awaits his coming. Before he arrives, however, Dryden has controlled his inclination and does not forget that he is a gentleman. He respectfully escorts Marion to the door and announces that his brother seems to have forgotten his appointment and, if she is ready, he will see her home.

Just as they are leaving the studio Mr. Harrington enters. He accuses Dryden of being discourteous to his wife. Dryden denies it, and Mr. Harrington strikes Dryden a heavy blow. Mrs. Harrington convinces him that Dryden has done nothing wrong.

SEEING DOUBLE (April 19.—Binks is addicted to drink. His wife seeks to cure him. One day she meets the Misses Simms, twins. A happy idea comes to her and she invites the girls to spend a few days at her home, acquainting them with her scheme to cure her husband of his insatiable habit. They arrive at Mrs. Binks' home, dressed exactly alike. That evening, when Mr. Binks returns from business, somewhat drunk, his wife introduces him to one of the girls, while the other hides directly behind her. John is delighted to meet the young lady. He turns his back, and upon looking at her again he sees her double. This causes him to hold his eyes and question his senses. When he takes his hands from his eyes and looks again he only sees one. He is convinced that he is seeing double. Wherever he turns he sees the girl in pairs. He goes to bed, and has no sooner gotten located than he sees the double girl looking through his window, with candles in their hands. The ruse proves successful and Binks is cured.

JEAN AND HER FAMILY (April 19).—A description of this subject was printed on page 1242 of the issue dated March 22.

LUBIN.

MINNIE, THE WIDOW (April 14).—Minnie Windom, a fascinating widow, and her daughter, Clara, being moderately well to do, are spending the winter on the southeast coast. They are having a good time, for the widow is charming. The daughter feels that her mother is beating her. She must tell somebody, so she writes of her vexation to a girl chum and cries herself to sleep. The mother comes in, sees her daughter and tells her that she shall have her chance when she (the mother) has perfected her own affair. Major Dowling is pressing the widow pretty hard, and to give Clara her chance they remove from St. Augustine to another resort. Mrs. Windom does her best to distract attention; she dresses plainly and makes her eyes behave, but the major still pursues her, and in the end persuades her to say "Yes." After the marriage the widow resumes her attractive personality, and the major chases the young swells after Clara, so all is love and kisses.

ONE ON ROMANCE (April 14).—Helen Ross spends her time reading novels. She has made up her mind to marry only a young man whom she can save from something or other, or one who can rescue her in some romantic way. Her father comes to her room and asks her to come down to meet Jack Wilson, a young millionaire. She refuses to meet a man in such a commonplace way. When her father insists she packs a bag and announces that she is going to their country home. Ross comes down, carrying an armful of Helen's novels, and explains that the girl is romance-struck. The young man shows Ross an invitation he has, to spend the week-end at his cousin's home. They shake hands, and he leaves for his cousin's place, which, as it happens, adjoins the country home of the Rosses. About a week after Jack's arrival the young people decide to give private theatricals, and assemble for a rehearsal. In the playlet they are giving the leading character is supposed to be a criminal, and the others guards, officers, Salvation Army, etc. At the last moment the man who is taking the leading part is called away, and Jack is urged to take the role. But he refuses. The boys then lay hold of him and force him into the striped suit. As they turn away for a minute he leaps to an open window, jumps through and dashes away, the boys dressed as guards and officers in pursuit. Helen Ross is just then sitting on the grass in the garden and reading, as usual. She hears shouts and, looking up, sees Jack's head over the fence. He jumps over and races in her direction. She decides to save him. As he is about to run past her she stops him and, pulling him down on the ground beside her, takes his head in her lap and hastily places her parasol over him. Just then the mock officers leap over the fence. As soon as they are gone Helen sits up, but Jack seems to have forgotten that he should get up, and continues to lie there. Helen angrily gets up, and his head bangs on the ground. He then stands up and, looking at her more closely, recognizes her as Helen Ross. She, however, does not know him, but believes him to be an escaped convict. She looks him over, and he being handsome, and also having saved him, she of course immediately falls in love with him. The end comes in the conventional way.

THE PAWNED BRACELET (April 15).—Jason Conrad, after a quarrel with his wife, buys her a bracelet. Some women friends drop in and suggest a luncheon and the theatre, "Dutch treat." Mrs. Conrad remembers that she has no "pin money" and decides to pawn the bracelet. Through a series of errors the husband's suspicions are aroused at the continued absence of the bracelet, but everything is finally explained.

THE RIGHT ROAD (April 17).—John Craig, leaving prison, determines to live straight. He becomes a real estate and mine dealer and earns the respect of Luther Patten, a mine investor, and the love of his daughter, Laura. Tom Watson, a mine shark, offers his outworked mine for sale through Craig's office. Craig advises Patten to take a ten-day option on it. Patten takes the option and then cancels it. Craig goes to Watson's mine to tell him of Patten's decision and discovers that a landslide has uncovered a rich vein of gold. Craig goes to Patten's home to tell him of this. Watson, realizing that he is about to lose, tries, through his foreman, to injure Patten, and does so before Craig sees him. Craig, to save the day, forges Patten's name for $2,000 and cashes it to pay Watson. When Craig sees Patten he confesses his past as a forger, and Patten forgives him.

THE POWER OF THE CROSS (Special—2 reels—April 18).—"Never part with this cross; it was your father's." These were the last words of Paul Damer's mother as she placed the cross about his neck. A few months later the young clergyman accepts an offer to take a parish at Glenwood, with an invitation to make his home with John Temple, a wealthy churchman. There he meets Iris, daughter of Temple, and Mary Gray, her cousin. Mary immediately falls in love with Paul, but the latter soon becomes infatuated with Iris, though she is very indifferent toward the young clergyman until she learns from the dashing widow, Mrs. Brunton, of Mary's love for him. Iris then determines, as a matter of conquest, to win the minister. When Paul declares his love for Iris, Temple readily gives his consent. Through the persistent pleas of the lively widow, Iris is led to accept her invitations as of old, and it was due to her failure to return home at the proper hour on one occasion which prompted her father to go in search of her. Instead of Iris being at Mrs. Brunton's home, he found her at a fashionable cafe, inebriated. Taking her home, they are met by the clergyman-husband, who now learns for the first time of his wife's weakness, but promptly forgives her upon her promise to break from Mrs. Brunton and her set. Later, when Paul decides to visit Dr. Banks at his old home, Iris takes advantage of his absence by giving a card party to Mrs. Brunton and her friends. Wine flows freely. Paul returns unexpectedly and discovers them. A violent quarrel ensues, resulting in Iris leaving and going to Mrs. Brunton's. All efforts to bring her back are futile. Iris goes from bad to worse. A rejected suitor, Clifford Moore, is a steady visitor at the Brunton home. Paul grows desperate at his wife's absence and, in a fit of despondency, tears away his holy vestments, but when he attempts to destroy the cross, Mary prevents. Completely crazed, Paul grabs a bottle from the sideboard and drains it. Unnerved by what he has witnessed, the father, John Temple, falls dead. Later Paul meets Clifford in a gambling house and, accusing him for his wife's desertion, attacks him, declaring that he "will kill him." The men are separated and Paul put out. Clifford leaves the resort, a heavy winner that night, and is followed by Cardwell, a gambler and crook, who waylays, robs and murders him. When the crime is discovered Paul is readily suspected, arrested and tried. Many witnesses testify to hearing Paul's threat at the gambling house. All hope vanishes until Mary Gray, regardless of public opinion, swears to Paul's presence in her own home the night of the crime. Her story is proved and Paul is finally freed, just as word comes that Iris is dying in an old tenement basement, where she has taken refuge. Mary and Paul arrive at the bedside just as Iris is breathing her last.

A few months pass. Mary is now a nurse in a hospital. Paul, repenting for the life he has been leading, calls upon Mary, who returns to him the cross upon hearing him declare that he is going to preach in foreign lands and wants her to accompany him as his wife. Convinced of his sincerity, Mary capitulates, and with Paul in full vestment once more they journey onward, placing their trust in "The Power of the Cross."

BABY'S NEW PIN (April 18).—Jim Perkins and wife are very proud of their baby. They receive a visit from auntie, who presents baby with a fancy dress pin. The pin drops to the floor. Mother misses it and thinks baby has swallowed it, and sets up an awful cry and sends Jim for all the neighbors and doctors in the village. Each in turn have their particular remedy which they give to baby. After the whole village has tried to save baby, Dr. Slow, the fastest doctor in the village, enters and finds the pin on the floor where it had dropped, and saves the baby's life.

BEATING MOTHER TO IT (April 18).—Mrs. Ray's daughter, Bess, loves Tom Travers, but mother objects. Mrs. Ray has a love affair with John Jackson, who seeks her hand. The two love affairs clash frequently. Jackson hires an automobile to elope with mother. Tom and Bess get his note. Tom hires a car and plays chauffeur, while Bess delivers the note to her mother, after turning the clock back one hour. Bess, in the car with Tom, disguised as chauffer, call for Jackson. Bess being veiled, Jackson thinks her to be the widow. They drive to a minister, where Tom and Bess are married, with Jackson as an unwilling witness. Mother forgives them later.

A FLORIDA ROMANCE (April 19).—John Bruce and his daughter, Bess, were plain Southern country folks, growing oranges, Old Bruce likes Jim Lang, an employe, who loves Bess. One day the young folks ask his consent to their marriage. He tells Jim to wait a year. Bess goes to visit city relatives, and when the year is up she forgets Jim. She becomes cultured and falls in love with Count De Tourney. One day Jim sends her a branch of oranges, and the count sends her his usual box of roses. She meditates over these, and two visions arise. On the right she sees herself dancing with the count at a grand ball; on the left she sees Jim and herself among the orange trees at home. She decides that she is tired of the count and city life, and hurries home. She finds she is happier there and that she loves Jim the best, after all.

KALEM.

A STREAK OF YELLOW (April 14).—Evelyn Gregory, a society girl, is courted by Sidney Worthy, a serious young man with a high sense of honor, and Charles Cadwell, whose jolly disposition makes him a great favorite. Cadwell wins Evelyn's promise, and when he breaks the news to his rival, Worthy warmly congratulates him.

Evelyn gives a supper party to announce her engagement, and while preparing the chafing dish there is an explosion which severely burns the hostess. A doctor is quickly summoned, and when an examination is made he announces that Evelyn will be disfigured for life, to the horror of the guests.

Cadwell's cowardly nature asserts itself when, after two weeks of deliberation, he sends Evelyn a heartless note, stating that he cannot marry her, now that she has lost her beauty; that he is leaving for Europe, and that she must make no effort to change his determination.

Worthy calls on Evelyn shortly after she has received the note. Her features are concealed by a veil, and Worthy is full of sympathy. When he is told of the note he makes a sudden resolve and visits Cadwell's apartments. Tom roundly denounces Cadwell and demands that he apologize to Evelyn. There is an altercation, followed by a struggle, and Cadwell flees. Worthy pursues and brings Cadwell to Evelyn's home. Evelyn, still veiled, receives the two men, and Cadwell utters his forced apology. The girl will not accept it, and removes her veil. To the amazement of Worthy and Cadwell, Evelyn's face is unblemished. Evelyn realizes that her first choice was ill-advised, and Worthy claims his own.

A PLOT FOR A MILLION (April 16).—Dick Logan, the son of a wealthy broker, is spending the winter in the South. One afternoon the engine of his motor boat gets out of commission and he is given timely assistance by Elsie, the daughter of a tugboat captain. A warm friendship is established.

Dick's father decides to take a yachting trip south, and when he makes the announcement his scheming secretary plans to profit by his employer's absence. The secretary calls on a rival broker, and a plan is made to attack Logan's holdings while he is out of communication with his office.

Mr. Logan arrives in the South and is welcomed by Dick, who presents Elsie and quietly informs his father that she is the girl of his choice. The broker, who has made other plans, does not approve of the match, but keeps his own counsel.

Meanwhile the attack on the market is commenced, and Logan's office sends him a message, ordering instructions. The secretary, who has accompanied Logan on the trip, receives a wire from his confederate, stating that the broker must be kept from communicating with his office at all costs. The pilot of the yacht is bribed to run the boat ashore, and when his purpose is detected the secretary takes drastic measures and imprisons Logan in his cabin.

Dick, who has been visiting Elsie on the tugboat, witnesses his father's struggles from a distance and immediately pursues the yacht. When the secretary tries to shoot down the fair pilot he is swept across the deck by the tug's fire hose. Jumping to the yacht, Dick is soon master of the situation and, apprehending the secretary, he liberates his father. The latter comes to the conclusion that his son has made a wise choice, after all.

THE BRAVEST GIRL IN CALIFORNIA (April 18).—The comedian and his daughter, "small time" performers, present their act and are given the "hook." "There's nothing to this business, anyway!" exclaims the masculine member of the team of entertainers, and they proceed forthwith to secure a more profitable occupation. At a riding academy the girl demonstrates that she is a clever horsewoman and is given a position as instructor, while father finds work in the stable. One day a wealthy young man patronizes the academy, and father is on the alert to introduce his daughter. The young people become much attached, but father

THE MILLIONAIRES' PLAYGROUND (April 18. —While residents of the Northern states are still waiting for evidence of the fact that "the backbone of winter" has been broken, the person who witnesses this novel motion picture production will be enabled to make a 15-minute visit to the celebrated resort, Palm Beach, Florida, where people of wealth enjoy the winter season. From his wheelchair Mr. Chauncey Depew witnesses a spirited ball game. Mrs. William K. Vanderbilt, strolling along the beach, stops to visit with the bathers. Mayor Demick picks up cocoanuts in his front yard, and Mayor Anderson of West Palm Beach feeds a flock of wild ducks. Mr. Hugh Inman, Mrs. Percy Williams and Mrs. Payne Whitney are among the notables. We see the Beach Club—the Monte Carlo of America—and after watching a golf game we witness a fashionable version of the "turkey trot."

THE FIRE-FIGHTING ZOUAVES (April 19).—Egbert Hayes, a lieutenant in the United States army, is courting Roxana Minton, the young and pretty daughter of Herbert Minton, a wealthy New York business man. The girl does not object to the lieutenant, but is inclined to favor Ben Roderick, the leader of Engine Company No. 1 of the N. Y. Volunteer Fire Company. Responding with patriotic zeal to the North's call for volunteers, Ben and a dozen of his comrades enlist and join the regiment of "Zouaves." They are subjected to great ridicule at first because of their odd uniforms, and Hayes misses no opportunity to discredit Ben. Nevertheless the Zouaves faithfully practice their athletic drills.

Time passes and Ben and his men distinguish themselves on the field of battle. The fireman is promoted to a commission. At this time Lieutenant Hayes, who is camping with a detachment of his regiment in Northern Virginia, invites Mr. Minton and Roxana to visit the camp. Minton and his daughter arrive, but only to fall into a terrible catastrophe. They have only been encamped a short time when the Confederates attack, and Roxana takes refuge in a nearby house. A fierce battle is waged and the house is set on fire.

The skill of the Zouaves now asserts itself, and in one of their spectacular formations Ben is lifted to the window, dashes through the flames and rescues the girl. He immediately joins his men and makes a strategic attack on the enemy.

This double feat of heroism not only brings to the young man the esteem of all, but also a badge of honor and the hand of the beautiful Roxana.

ESSANAY.

THE ACCUSATION OF BRONCHO BILLY (April 15).—Broncho Billy, owner of a saloon in Big Horn City, is trusted implicitly by the miners in the surrounding territory. Several of them have gathered at the bar, when Broncho Billy receives a note, stating that the stage-coach will not stop at Big Horn until the following day. The men request Broncho Billy to keep their gold until the coach arrives. Broncho Billy locks the gold in an iron chest, and asks the men if they will keep the key. They tell him no, that it would probably be safer with him. Broncho Billy retires with his clothes on, to be able to protect the gold if necessary. During the night Broncho Billy walks in his sleep. He takes the gold from the chest, carries it under a nearby house, where he places it in a barrel. He then returns to his bunk, where he sleeps the remainder of the night. The next morning he is dumbfounded when he discovers the loss. He informs the sheriff, who suggests locking him in a cell to prevent the men from lynching him. That night, the men break into the jail, overpower the sheriff, and are about to make quick work of Broncho Billy, when they discover him walking around in the cell asleep. They open the door and allow him to go out. Broncho Billy retraces his steps of the night previous, gets the gold and returns it to the chest, goes quietly to his bunk, where he continues to sleep. The men, overjoyed at the return of the gold, and discovering their terrible mistake in believing that Broncho Billy had stolen it, help themselves to a good drink at the bar.

THE CAPTURE (April 16).—It is the unexpected things in life that happen, which was proven when Bob Burns applied to John Hennessy for a position. Burns is told that single men are not engaged, that if he gets married by twelve o'clock the following day, the position is his. Burns writes two of his young lady friends, asking them to marry him, and to meet him at eleven o'clock. Undecided which one to mail, he allows a young boy to pick one of the letters out of his pocket and mail it. By accident, the other letter drops to the sidewalk. A good samaritan, seeing the letter, picks it up and mails it. The next morning, at the appointed time, the two ladies arrive on the scene, and claim Burns for theirs. Not knowing what to do, Burns simply throws up the sponge and takes to his heels. Burns runs into an apartment building, where he comes face to face with an old sweetheart of his. He proposes to her and is accepted. They get married. Bob and his young bride arrive at his employer's office, where the two young ladies rush in with a policeman. Mr. Hennessy is overwhelmed when he discovers that Burns' young bride is his daughter Ruth.

THE UNKNOWN (April 18).—Mr. Hoyt, a wealthy broker, loses his wife. Marie, a maid in the Hoyt household, has her mother call on her. Marie's mother recognizes Mr. Hoyt. Several weeks later, Hoyt has a long talk with Marie, which finally ends by his asking consent to call on her mother. Hoyt calls on Marie's mother, where he takes her in his arms and kisses her fondly. Marie is informed by her mother that Mr. Hoyt is her father.

THE CROSSING POLICEMAN (April 18).—Patrick's love for Lillian Sinclair, a young cripple girl, costs him his position. The physician attending Lillian informs the policeman that an operation is necessary to bring about the young child's normal condition. Murphy gives the doctor his pay check and tells him to make the girl well again. The operation is a successful one. Lillian's first thought is of her policeman friend, Murphy. He having been discharged from the police force for neglect of duty, is not found on his beat by the little girl. Two years later Murphy returns to the city in want. Lillian and her mother, in the meantime, had prospered by the death of a relative. Murphy is found in front of Lillian's home dying of starvation. He is carried into the luxurious home, where he is given the best that money can buy. He recognizes his little sweetheart. A few weeks later, we recognize Murphy as the gardener, and beside him the sweetest flower of all, Lillian.

ALKALI IKE'S HOMECOMING (April 19).—During Alkali Ike's visit to the East, Slippery Slim made rapid progress for the hand of Soffie Clutts. On this particular day in February, Slippery Slim is very much dejected when he calls on Soffie and discovers that she is admiring several photographs of her old friend Alkali. To give him a better sailing, Slim shows Soffie a fictitious note, stating that Alkali Ike died that day. Soffie's old love returns, she dashes madly from the house, leaving her suitor bewildered, rushes to the general store, where she purchases several yards of crepe, some black dress material and a box of mourning handkerchiefs, also a floral piece. That afternoon, the boys on the ranch receive a telegram stating that Alkali Ike will arrive that day. He is met at the train by the Lizardville band and a group of cowboys, who give him a welcoming never to be forgotten. Alkali Ike's first thought was of Soffie. He goes to his bunk house where he sheds his citizens' clothes and dons his chaps, flannel shirt and Stetson hat. He is overwhelmed when he sees the floral piece with the following inscription: "To my beloved Alkali. Died February 2nd, 1913." He rushes madly to Soffie's home, where, upon looking through the window, he discovers Slippery Slim trying to console the weeping miss. Slim discovers Alkali at the window, takes another good look and leaves rather hurriedly. Alkali enters. Soffie, overjoyed, throws her arms about him and claims the smiling westerner for her own.

CINES.

THE QUEEN OF SPADES (2 reels—Special) April 7).—In spite of his wife's earnest appeals, Jack Norris refuses to give up gambling, and after squandering all they possess in the world, suddenly disappears, leaving the unfortunate woman to support herself and her little daughter.

Thrown upon her own resources, she is finally compelled by necessity to accept a proposition from unscrupulous money sharks to take charge of a fashionable gambling house. Her education and refinement have fitted her to become a most efficient manager, and in five years' time she fully realizes her employer's ambitions. The most fashionable people in the town find in her their natural leader, and are easily held under her sway.

One day, however, her heart stands still, when she receives a letter from her daughter, Dorothy, who is attending boarding school, stating that she has passed her final examinations and is waiting to be taken home. Mrs. Norris pleads with the employers to relinquish her from the infamous contract, but without avail. Dorothy is brought to live at her mother's apartment, but is scrupulously kept in ignorance of her mother's position.

One evening a brilliant entertainment is given, and the unsuspecting girl is radiantly happy amidst it all, when suddenly she overhears a loud dispute among several of the guests engaged in a game of cards in an adjoining room, and the true character of the establishment is revealed. In a flood of tears, she rushes to her room, and later, when her mother comes to comfort her, Dorothy explains that she now understands why her fiance, the son of a high official, has determined to break off their engagement because of her mother's ambiguous position.

Mrs. Norris is in deep despair. Her daughter's happiness is paramount; it must be preserved at any cost, and without delay. Accompanied by Dorothy, she pays a visit to the young man and asks him if he will withdraw his objections if she agrees to go away forever. He finally consents, and, with a last sad farewell, the heartbroken mother leaves them clasped in each other's arms.

FAINT HEART NE'ER WON FAIR LADY (April 5).—Percy is the bashful pet of his fond mamma, who wishing to see her son marry to good advantage, arranges his engagement to the daughter of a wealthy friend. However, the young lady in question is not at all pleased with the match, and in order to get rid of the "delicate creature," insists upon his proving ability in athletics. Percy makes a ludicrous spectacle of himself on the field of sports, for he proves to be as awkward as he is timid, and his antics provide plenty of amusement for the young woman and her friends. At last poor Percy begins to understand the situation, and returns home to tell his mother of the ill-treatment. This results in the sudden termination of the engagement, much to the young lady's sorrow (?).

Jim loves Anne passionately and she returns his affection, until one day a young dandy from the city, who is spending his vacation in the neighborhood, pays her marked attentions and causes her to despise her humble lover.

Jim is heart-broken but resolves to keep the pair under close surveillance. One day he follows them along the seashore and when the visitor attempts to become too forward in his attentions, Jim rushes to the assistance of the struggling girl, and after easily disposing of her assailant, escorts her home.

Anne now realizes Jim's true worth, and the next day tells him that she has decided that she can return his love. Jim, however, hesitates, having serious doubts as to her sincerity, but the earnest look in her eyes and her solemn plea to be forgiven soon dispel these misgivings and it is not long before the happy lovers are hurrying home to ask her father's consent.

Horrors! One evening she discovers a perfumed note in Sammy's pocket, from a certain Fanny requesting him to see her the following day at 3 o'clock. The next afternoon, Mrs. Briggs pays a visit to the rival and by bribery gains permission to receive her callers. She seats herself on the sofa in eager anticipation of the surpise that that she will give to Sammy. Meanwhile Sammy has induced his friend Jones to call on Fanny and take her out to dinner. Obediently Jones appears at the appointed hour and believing the widow to be Fanny, starts a violent flirtation. Although she rather enjoys the fun, the widow finally confesses the deception, but Jones gallantly claims it makes no difference and insists upon taking her to dinner. Needless to say that in the meantime Sammy makes good use of his opportunity.

But their unfriendly attitude does not disturb Anita, who is always cheerful, and whose presence is like a ray of sunshine in the home. Her cousins, however, cannot tolerate her, and after vainly begging their father to send Anita away, form a desperate plan to get rid of her. One day, they entice the unsuspecting girl to the edge of a steep cliff, and when she is not looking, push her over to fall, as they think, to certain death. The guilty pair then hurry away, and pretend not to have been near the place.

Anita, however, is fortunately rescued by the villagers, and the next day when she appears on the hillside, her cousins believe it is her ghost returning to avenge their crime. They fall on their knees before her in terror, but she calmly approaches and proves to their unbelieving eyes that she is still alive. After forgiving them, she brings about a reconciliation with their father.

However, the night before the great event, Jim learns that "Pretty Dolly" has developed a bad cough which seriously cripples her chances. Temptation appears to Jim, "If 'Pretty Dolly' can't win, why not keep the money for myself?"

The day of the race arrives, but instead of being the favorite, "Pretty Dolly" goes to the post at the odds of 6 to 1. Jim carefully considers the matter and then decides to keep the money in his pocket. "They're off!" exclaims the excited multitude, and round and round the course rush the horses with many a serious fall at the hurdles. Against all expectations, "Pretty Dolly" comes in under the wire a winner by four lengths. The result is a terrible blow to Jim as he realizes that he has now stolen $30,000 from his employer. When Mr. Walker returns and asks for his winnings, Jim is forced to confess his crime. Roused to a terrible fury, Walker discharges him in disgrace. ECLIPSE.

THE FRUIT OF SUSPICION (April 2).—William Graves happens to observe his wife receive a note from his friend George Moore, and later, without listening to explanations, angrily banishes her from the home. Fifteen years pass and Graves is living alone with his daughter Marjorie. One day he receives a letter from his wife who at the point of death again protests her innocence. Graves, however, is not convinced and the terrible doubt still tortures him.

His resentment is intensified when he learns that his daughter is engaged to Fred Moore, the son of the man who caused all of the trouble. When the young fellow asks for his consent, Graves sternly refuses and even forbids him the house. Fred then explains the situation to his father, who immediately pays a visit to the Graves' home and explains the whole matter, stating that fifteen years ago he merely called to give Mrs. Graves some old love-letters to be secretly returned to Graves' sister. Convinced now of his wife's innocence, he gives his consent to the marriage, but cannot be consoled in his grief over the great injustice to his wife.

Later, while the broken-hearted man is sitting in his half-darkened library, Marjorie, dressed in her mother's wedding gown, enters the room. The father believes he sees a vision of his departed wife and with a cry of horror, falls upon the floor lifeless.

AN UP-TO-DATE AVIATOR (April 9).—The inventive Sammy constructs a bicycle with wings, which carries him through the air at a tremendous rate. One day he "flies" to his home-town for a short visit and the awe-struck villagers hail him as a great hero. After astounding them with exhibitions of his skill at shooting and other sports, he decides to return to the city. Amid the shouts of the crowd, he mounts his machine and makes a good start, but has not proceeded far when, bang! something goes wrong with the mechanism; the machine turns turtle and comes down to earth with a thud. Sammy is extracted from the ruins more dead than alive.

MAKING BIRCH BROOMS (April 9).—An interesting and instructive subject showing every detail in the process, including the cutting, gathering and binding of the birch, and finally the fashioning and attaching of the handles.

THE KENTISH COAST (England) (April 9).—After leaving the town of Margate, we are taken upon a trip along the coast, visiting Ramsgate Harbor and it's splendid beach crowded with pleasure seekers, and then re-embarking, past the famous Dover Cliffs which are still such a terror to mariners.

SELIG.

THE WOODSMAN'S DAUGHTER (April 14).—Blase Jim Alridge, weary of city life, coming to his apartment, finds an invitation from an old chum, Dick Freeman, to come and visit him at his lodge in the wilds. A week later the two are reviewing the days of long ago before the firelog. While hunting a short time after, Jim meets Marion, a girl of the forest, and is fascinated by her strange type of femininity. He teaches her to read and write, and without considering the difference in their tastes and social standing asks her to marry him. They return to the city. Taken from her romantic environment, the charm of Marion and her crudities pall upon him, as she seemingly does not take to the ways of the city. She realizes only too keenly his change of attitude. One day in desperation leaves him a note and flies back to the forest. Jim seeks again old companions. He finds Helen, an old dame who tolerates him for his money. He is about to free himself from Marion by divorce, when he accidently picks up a note in Helen's apartment addressed to her mother in which she tells of urging the divorce to capture Jim for his worldly goods. This opens his eyes. He finds the faithful Marion and they live happily in the shadows of the wilderness.

GOD'S WAY (April 15).—Tom Healy, silver haired and stoop shouldered, has served fifteen years, the victim of circumstantial evidence. He reads a letter from his wife; she has again petitioned the governor for his pardon. The warden summons him, the pardon has come; he is released. His first good deed is to separate two street urchins fighting and make them friends. Then comes a pathetic meeting at the unpretentious cottage where his faithful old wife has worked and waited for him so long. Joy mingles with tears as they gaze at the empty cradle he left tenanted fifteen years before. The litle tenant has passed away. His old employer bids him be of good cheer and takes him back to work. Of course, the omnipresent detective comes in to remind the employer of his risk and responsibility, finding Tom Healy with his first week's pay. The employer tells the policeman to get out. Tom finds a drunken loafer Crimmens abusing his sickly crippled daughter, and the Juvenile Court eventually gives her into the care of Tom Healy and his wife to cheer their childless home.

HANKOW, CHINA (April 15).—Another interesting educational subject in the Selig series of Oriental travelogues.

DIXIELAND (April 16).—A minstrel troupe is embarking for a tour of the South. Henry Clay, a negro appears on the scene wearing the frayed coat of a Confederate General. He borrows a guitar from one of the minstrel men and begins singing "Way down South in Dixie," and the story unfolds. It opens coincident with the Civil war. The mistress at the old plantation sends Clay with a note to give to Belle at the next plantation. In response Belle returns and meets her lover Fairley, the brother of the mistress, while William, an older man, is revealed as the suitor of the hostess. It turns out in the course of a foxhunt that "William was a gay deceiver." Then comes the South in the saddle and the war. The mistress dies of a broken heart and Belle is left lonely. Fairley goes on secret service as a spy and writes Belle a farewell note. William, who is shown as conscience-stricken, rushes back to war duty. A battle results in William's capture, and he is taken North to prison accompanied by the faithful Clay. They attempt to escape prison and William is mortally wounded by a guard. Fairley has been captured as a spy and is about to be shot when the proclamation of peace arrests the order and releases him. Clay brings him a note from the dead William urging him to hasten south to Belle. The scene shifts to the ruined homes of the South, but Belle and Fairley are reunited, and the song rounds out the picturesque story on the old plantation with the negroes dancing the "walk around."

THE TIE OF THE BLOOD (April 17).—The prologue opens in the village of the Cherokees at the time of a visit from the friendly Osage. Setting Sun and Big Eagle, the dominant chiefs, as an evidence of good will and with the hope of perpetuating peace, arrange that their children, Deer Foot and Red Wing, shall marry when grown.

Years elapse and find Deer Foot and Red Wing prominent pupils at Carlisle. They accept their betrothal as agreeable. An ambitious and unscrupulous half-breed, Mathews, has a fancy for Red Wing. Deer Foot has a rival in Mathews, who succeeds in drugging the former, thereby carrying off the honors in an athletic contest. Red Wing, who has been led to believe Deer Foot lost by drunkenness, snubs him at the party following the athletic meet. Mathews puts fuel to the flame of her indignation, showing her a forged note in which his rival's name is linked with another woman. The same night Deer Foot receives a letter announcing the death of his father, calling him to the reservation to assume chieftainship. He releases his love from the pledge of their fathers.

In her misery Red Wing turns to Mathews and they become engaged. Subsequently she learns the half-breed already has a wife. She upbraids him and he strikes her. This breaks the engagement. She meets Deer Foot and tells him of Mathews' perfidy. They follow Mathews when he disbarks from a train. They trail him to the desert, empty his canteen and leave him in misery, as they ride away to the happiness they have sought in their own village.

CURED OF HER LOVE (April 18).—Ruth Reddington, an odd girl, is discovered reading "True Love Defies the World." Papa takes the book and tells her to drop such trash. Ruth goes to the window as father and mother have a family jar. She looks out and sees Peter, the chauffeur, and blows him a kiss. This is like a joy ride to Peter and he blows back. Mother observes this and tells papa. He goes down and orders Peter to take him down to his office. Ruth, inflated with the French novel, writes Peter a note that she will elope with him as arranged. Her mother reads the impress of this note on the blotter and plans to cure her daughter of her romantic attachment by showing Peter at close range at their reception that evening. The chauffeur is delighted, and dons noisy clothes. He combs his hair after he gets in the parlor—shakes hands all around, shows the guests his adornment from tie to socks and finally so behaves at the dinner-table that the dis-illusioned Ruth requests that he be taken away.

THAT MAIL ORDER SUIT (April 18).—Steve, ambitious to outstrip his rivals, Slim and Tex, in a race for Betty's hand, orders a dress-suit by mail. The spike-tail is an awful fit and Steve retires from Betty's inspection anything but pleased. He gives the "fixios" to a Mexican, who in turn suffers from the hands of the populace when he makes his appearance in public, and is finally suspiciously pursued by a posse. As they all fly past Betty's window, she thinks Steve is the man in the dress suit and sends Slim and Tex to guard him. In the interim Steve comes in properly dressed and wins the girl.

PATHEPLAY.

IN THE DAYS OF WAR (Special, 2 parts, April 12).—James Adams and his brother-in-law, Paul Chase, united in friendship by their mutual love for Mrs. Adams, part at the outbreak of the Civil War because their sympathies call them to different sides in the great struggle of fifty years ago. In what proves to be the decisive struggle of the great conflict, four years later, Adams, now with the rank of Major, first meets his brother-in-law, Major Chase, on the field of battle before Richmond. Major Adams is leading a force of Union soldiers in an effort to capture and control a bridge ably defended by the Confederate troops under Major Chase. Chase, losing ground rapidly, decides to ruin the vantage point which he cannot hold, and accordingly, when the Union soldiers are half way across it, the bridge is blown to atoms.

The two men, who have served their respective causes so nobly, find themselves side by side and seriously injured in a field hospital, where Mrs. Adams, acting as a Red Cross nurse, tells them the glad news that the war is ended. Another thrilling episode in this spectacular film is the desperate struggle of Major Adams, disguised as a Confederate trooper, to visit his baby daughter, and then outwit the sentries, who have discovered his disguise and who force him to take a wild leap from a cliff to get back to the Union camp again.

She instructs her art agent to purchase all of Lucien Henry's paintings, but to keep her name secret. When this has been accomplished, the artist is invited to view all of his paintings. The Marquise in forms him of her intention and before he can prevent it, she succeeds in setting fire to the little house containing the art gems, thus compelling him to witness the destruction of his life's work.

THE ITALIAN BRIDE (April 16).—A story typical of the lives of the natives of Sunny Italy. Two brothers of widely different characteristics come to America, where they continue their struggle for the same girl. One brother wins honorably and the other loses dishonorably. The Italian character is portrayed in this film with a sympathetic understanding that makes it a delight to even those who are not natives of the Gem of the Mediterranean.

GLIMPSES OF THE NATIONAL CAPITAL (April 17).—First the camera gives us a view of the very beautiful Potomac Falls. Then, in sequence, the Union Station, the Marine Hospital, the House of Representatives Office Building, the principal streets and avenues, the War College, the White House and the Capitol itself, and other incidental views too numerous to mention, but which combine to enable spectators to know Washington as well as if they had paid the city a visit in person.

THE SPONGE INDUSTRY IN CUBA (April 17).—An interesting study of all the phases of an unfamiliar, although thriving industry.

SCHOOL OF GYMNASTICS (April 18).—The French soldiers herein show their prowess in the difficult and thrilling art of military gymnastics. They scale high walls with an ease and grace that is admirable, cross from roof to roof by means of slack ropes and perform many other maneuvers that are remarkably interesting to behold and that will break the monotony of the usual drama and comedy offerings.

THE CUTTLEFISH (April 18).—Although the cuttlefish may not be very well known, it furnishes material for some very interesting study. This fish supplies the cuttlefish bone which is given to birds and on which they enjoy sharpening their bills.

THE PRIDE OF INNOCENCE (April 19).—The wealthy Miss Mills, a charity worker, finds her kindness misunderstood by her lover. Too proud to deny the accusation, that is prompted by a too great love, she refuses to prove her innocence. But things taking their natural course, soon show the young man the error of his hasty supposition and bring him humbly to beg the girl's forgiveness, which is granted him.

MELIES.

WHAT IS SAUCE FOR THE GOOSE (April 17).—After a lightning courtship of but a few days, a young couple unite in a hasty marriage, just in time to catch ship at Frisco for a cruise to the South Sea Islands. All goes lovely the first few days, but when three days out the charm of the honeymoon loses it's edge and the young bride becomes rather more attentive to other young men on board than to her spouse,

In desperation, the husband is mad enough to murder every man on board, but with the connivance of the steward, decides on a better method to kill them in his wife's affection—by the use of ipecac. It is served in their tea as they are about the pretty girl and as it takes its effect, each beats a hasty retreat to the railing to lose his—well, dignity, to say the least.

A few hours stop at Papeete, on the island of Tahiti, and the wife is given another shock—the native girls fall in love with her husband, and are not bashful. This proves the best cure of all and on the return trip all but the husband find the atmosphere extremely chilly within a radius of ten feet of the bride's steamer chair.

A TAHITIAN FISH DRIVE (April 17).—An event that happens in Tahiti but once in every ten years and only by special permission of the French Governor of Tahiti. A holiday is declared. Three hundred natives parade to the sea shore, where, after praying to the God Shark for success, they proceed far out into the sea in canoes. A large semi-circle is formed and the natives, jumping from their canoes, beat the water with brush, coming closer and closer to the shore, driving the fish in into a coral basin, where they are speared to the number of thousands.

BIOGRAPH.

HE HAD A GUESS COMING (April 14).—Dick was a sport, but on the reception of a telegram from his uncle that he would visit him, plays the mollycoddle, believing his uncle to be one of the strait-laced type. The young man, however, was mistaken, for the uncle is a sport and when he leaves Dick he is disgusted and in such a bad humor that it looks as if Dick would be neglected in his will.

A HORSE ON BILL (April 14).—An actor arrives in town and plans a benefit for the town band. The leading lady of the performance is loved by the leader of the band and the trombone player. The leader, of course, is the favored one and as these two men are to enact the part of the wild horse in the performance, the trombone player, in trying to get even, works disaster for both of them.

A FRIGHTFUL BLUNDER (April 17).—An eye strain was really the cause of making the young business man realize that he loved the young typist and a wrongly compounded remedy for the same eye strain placed the girl in grave danger, the danger being averted merely through the ingenuity of the young business man with the help of his friend, the power superintendent of the city's street-car lines. The eye strain—well, a solitaire proved an excellent remedy.

A MISUNDERSTOOD BOY (April 19).—Everything he did seemed to be misconstrued, except by the little lady he loved. The town roisters made fun of her and his love. That made trouble and the chief vigilante believed him the cause of it all. So he was "in wrong" all around. The girl's father also sided with the opinion of the world, and sent both the boy and girl away. Mother was on a visit at the time, and therein the need of such a one at home was proved, for once back she sent the father out to bring them home again. The boy in the gold hills had been misunderstood again. Marauding merchants had left their victim on the mountain pass and the boy, coming on the scene, was again accused, but the lie in the end destroyed itself.

KINEMACOLOR.

A SHATTERED IDEAL.—Jean Fabre, an artist, desiring to paint a big picture, uses three models—one for the figure, one for the face, and one for the hair. He wins the great prize. Bradley, rich, in love with Ethel, is fascinated by the painting, and through the artist, seeks an introduction to the model. Fabre is in love with Ethel, too. He shows her Bradley's letter. She is furious. Bradley is invited to the studio. The three models have been transformed, the girl of the figure into a negress. The fascinated one, on looking over the three is horror-stricken. Bradley gets back his ring from Ethel; the artist wins the girl he loves.

GOLLIWOG'S MOTOR ACCIDENT.—Golliwog appears seated in his brown boot, which he drives as he would an automobile, steering with great agility. Boot brushes polish the "car," first with a coat of black, then brown and then yellow. Golliwog, in examining his "car," is hit by another "machine." Out of his leg pour sawdust and shavings in a stream. With a handsaw the cause of the accident performs an amputation. With a boot lace the injured "machine" is taken in tow to Golliwog's home, where the family is much upset by the mishap.

HIS BROTHER'S KEEPER.—This is a story of two brothers in love with the same girl. She loves Jim, the younger, but to the two, as they start for the West, she gives each a photograph, inscribed: "May each be his brother's keeper—Mary." The brothers prosper. Ben works hard. His brother hangs about dance halls with Denver Dolly. When seeking his brother Ben is shot in mistake by Jim, who goes away, thinking he has killed him. Ben is nursed by Dolly, who reforms. Jim, conscience-stricken, gives himself up. The "boys" decide to hang him. Dolly arrives on the scene as the rope is about to be drawn and saves Jim.

POWERS.

THE TROUBADOUR OF THE RANCHO (April 18).—Pedro is an irresponsible rascal, albeit a lovable one, who is better at playing quoits than he is at work. He is fond of both Don Miguel and his pretty bride, Maria, and he serenades them with one of his seductive tunes when they return from their honeymoon.

Time passes, and the care of the ranch takes up the greater part of Miguel's attention. so that while he still loves his bride, she sees but little of him and becomes despondent. This state of mind causes her to become temporarily infatuated with Don Diego, a visitor who finally persuades her to go away with him.

Meanwhile Pedro unable to appreciate the dignity of toil is discharged by Miguel. Mounting his burro he leaves the ranch, and later, while idly reclining beside the road, sees Diego and Maria ride by. Puzzled he followa and sees them enter a small inn for lunch, leaving the horses tied outside. He senses something wrong and releases one of the animals, sending it galloping off. The alarm is given, and Diego mounting the other, starts in pursuit. Pedro then plays the familiar love song and Maria, who has already begun to repent her move, comes out and begs him to take her home. Maria refuses to return with Diego, who overtakes them after capturing the escaped horse. Pedro interferes and beats the angry and discomforted Don, and Maria and Pedro start for home.

Meanwhile Miguel has learned of Maria's departure, and has started in pursuit. He meets them on the road, and Maria confesses, pleading for forgiveness. This Miguel at first declines to give but the sound of the love song from Pedro's guitar causes him to relent.

IMP.

THE LEADER OF HIS FLOCK (April 17—2 reels).—King Baggot plays a young minister with socialistic tendencies which are not liked by the elders of the church. He is very popular with the younger set. A poor young woman of the town is deserted by her unprincipled husband who destroys all record of their marriage. Their child soon dies and the minister calls to console the mother. Her reputation is considered shady by the townspeople. She starts to leave town, but falls exhausted outside the minister's home. He takes her in and gives her a home with himself and his mother. The elders object to this and the minister resigns. He takes up mission work in the slums and the woman goes with him.

One night her husband returns drunk and shabby. He tries to rob a saloon and is pursued by saloonkeeper and police. He takes refuge in the mission. The minister persuades the pursuers to leave the man with him. The husband and wife meet, but she will have nothing to do with him. He makes a scene and accuses the minister of being in love with his wife. He then goes out into the storm and is killed by lightning. The new minister at the church proves unsatisfactory. The elders send for their old minister. He returns to his church on condition that they sanction his marriage to the woman he has helped.

REX.

A FRIEND OF THE FAMILY (April 17).—George Markham is deeply in love with Phyllis Webster, the daughter of his banking partner; but has failed to make Phyllis respond. At the beach, she falls in love with a handsome young lifeguardsman. Markham unaware of this, asks Phyllis to marry him and she refuses. She marries the lifeguard and this angers her father, but his love for his daughter overcomes his desire to punish them, and he writes telling her to come home with her husband.

Things go well for a time, but Bob, too prosperous, starts upon the downward track. He leaves his wife much alone, to the indignation of her father and of Markham. Soon, he becomes enamoured of the notorious Madame Zigoletti, a contortionist. She leads him on and soon has him almost completely in her power. Markham sees him with her and expostulates, but is told to mind his own business. In the solitude of his room, Markham thinks the matter out and acts upon his decision. Knowing that Webster has put detectives on Bob's track, he goes to the Madame and forces himself upon her. In a talk with her he soon finds out that it is the money she wants and not the man. He offers her a check to give up Bob, so that he may return to his sorrowing wife. She consents, but they are interrupted by Bob, who arrives in an auto coat and cap and who tries to undo the arrangement made. He soon sees that this woman has made a cat's paw of him, and it brings him to his senses.

Markham hears the detectives coming, and he forces Bob into an inner room, and when they enter they are surprised to find the man of irreproachable character in the room instead of their quarry. He tells them they have made a mistake and quietly taking Bob's coat and hat, goes.

Bob returns to his wife, quite cured. He accepts the other man's sacrifice; and Mr. Webster, surprised and shocked at what he thinks is the moral depravity of his partner, forces him to resign and with a wry smile and the feeling of satisfaction that he has done signal service to the woman he loves, poor Markham drops out of sight and fights his battle out alone.

A BOOK OF VERSES (April 20).—The old poet is discouraged, for he knows his work is good. His opinion is shared by his daughter, Flo, but not by his wife. Flo takes the poems to a publisher's, but they will not even look at them, stating that they are a drug on the market. Flo is a public stenographer and Phil, a business man, dictates his letters to her and finds her attractive. He later sends his office boy for the finished letters, who, in taking them up also takes her manuscripts by mistake. Phil finds them and is struck by the beauty of the poems. He returns them in person and meets her father at the same time. He compliments the old poet on his work and leaves.

At Grace Richly's home, Grace is reading some poems of her own to her friends. They applaud—all except Phil, her intended. She asks him where she can have them typewritten and he takes her to Flo's office and leaves her there. While waiting, Grace reads the poet's work and offers to buy them for a good price and Flo, desiring to encourage her father, sells them to the girl. Grace takes them to the publisher, who, noting the signs of wealth of his caller, reads the poems and agrees to publish them. They make a great artistic and monetary success and Grace is lionized. In the meantime Phillips, being without a stenographer, persuades Flo to take a permanent position with him and she is glad of the opportunity.

A month later, Grace sends a copy of her book to Phil, who telephones his congratulation. Poor Flo looks on, wishing her dear old dad could have had the credit which rightly belonged to him, but she is unable to say anything in honor bound. That evening Phil calls upon Grace and she reads the poem she favors most, he recognizes it and turns upon her and finally leaves her. He goes to the home of the poet and tells him of the publication of his verse, and when the old man shows anger towards Flo, Phil shows him that he is interested in her future and persuades him to be encouraged and to write others, not hampered by the stress of poverty.

FRONTIER.

SOME DOINGS AT LONESOME RANCH (April 17).—The boys of the ranch have for a long time been requesting the ranch woman to hire a housemaid with a pretty face. At length she relents, inserts an advertisement which brings a young lady with a beautiful form, but heavily veiled. Her stature impresses the boys so much that they all "primp up" before they are introduced to her. Alas! they shrink away when they see her face, for her eyes are developing into a serious case of convergent strabismus. The boys decide to get rid of her and she is dragged away to a tree to be hung. Just as the noose is being placed around her neck, she is rescued by a cowboy who is equally as ugly. The girl goes to the house, packs her belongings and starts for the railway station. A letter arrives shortly after she has left and none of the boys except the ugly one will venture to give it to her. He mounts a horse and soon catches up with her. Upon reading the letter she finds that she has become heir to a large fortune. She goes back to the city and in passing a beauty parlor she sees a sign which reads: "Faces Made Over to Order." She enters and upon emerging she has a beautiful face. A few days later she goes back to Lonesome Ranch and all the boys try to make love to her. She shuns them all with the exception of the good-natured but ugly one. In reward for his kindness, she takes him to the city and has a "beauty face" put on him.

THE EVIL GENIUS (2 parts, April 16).—Jean Norbel, a toy manufacturer, and Louis Delval, an explorer, both love Helene Derys. She eventually marries the manufacturer. Several years later at a theater, Norbel meets Delval, and a reunion takes place. Delval takes advantage of this reunion and makes several successive calls at the Norbel home, each time trying to force his attentions upon Mrs. Norbel. Failing in this he bribes the watchman of Norbel's factory to set fire to the building. The place is soon in flames and the employees are helped to safety through the heroic work of Norbel. The next day, as Norbel is about to receive a medal from the mayor, an anonymous letter from an insurance company advises the city officials that the owner had set his factory on fire in order to get the insurance money. Norbel is arrested, and at the trial the watchman testifies that the manufacturer is the incendiary. The nervous breakdown of Mrs. Norbel stirs the watchman's conscience and he makes a confession just as the jury is about to give a verdict of guilty. This, of course, liberates Norbel, who returns home to his happy fireside with his wife and child.

THE WOMAN WHO KNEW (April 5).—Harry Beecher calls on his fiancee, Eva Martin, in an intoxicated state and she breaks the engagement. His mother, going to his room next morning, finds he has not been home all night and taking a photo of him from the desk compares it with one of his father. He returns to see this and she warns him he is following in his father's footsteps. Impressed, he promises to reform and telling her of the broken engagement, asks her to intercede with Eva for him. She agrees. Eva, however, refuses to renew the engagement, though plainly very unhappy. Harry's mother returns home. After she is gone, the girl thinks the matter over and writes a note to the mother saying she will marry Harry if his mother can truly believe she may trust her life's happiness to him. On her return, Mrs. Beecher tells Harry and in disappointment he rushes off to drink. Then the note comes. The mother clutches at the chance held out by the girl and starts to write a note. But as she writes, memories of the past arise and she remembers the wretchedness of her own life with a drunken husband, and slowly she tears the note and flings it into the waste basket.

THE STRONGER CALL (April 9).—The Western town of Alden has been disturbed by tales of a famous bandit, "Red Pete" who has been operating in the neighborhood. The sheriff receives $10,000 from the bank of the next town which must be taken to the Junction that night. Bob Ferris, who is in love with the sheriff's daughter, is detailed to take the money to the Junction.

On his way, Bob finds that his gun has mysteriously been filled with blank cartridges, so he stops at a shop in the village and puts in real bullets. He sees a man following him, and from his general aspect he knows him to be "Red Pete." As the bandit comes up, Bob kills him.

As he stoops over him and removes the mask, he discovers to his horror that "Red Pete" is no other than Grace's father, the sheriff.

The body is brought back to town and Bob receives the reward, but Grace filled with grief at her father's disgrace and death, refuses to speak to him.

A year later, however, they meet at her father's grave and her enmity is forgotten as she stops and listens to love.

AMERICAN.

SUSPENDED SENTENCE (April 14).—Old Judge Gainsworthy smiled doubtfully as he pinned a sheriff's star on the coat of young Frank Walling, for Frank was very young for the job. He did not, however, turn an unsmiling face toward Frank's assiduous suit of his daughter's hand.

Taking a drink a few days later with a stranger, the judge noticed counterfeit money in his hands. A day later the stranger was found murdered and robbed and the youthful sheriff, with boyish enthusiasm, rounded up a wayfaring cowpuncher. The jury pronounced him guilty, but Judge Gainsworthy refused to pronounce sentence then. A sleepless night sent him to Oak Flats. He stopped for a drink, noticed the bartender refuse a counterfeit bill from a black looking gun man, called up the youthful sheriff and in two hours Black Conway was in safe keeping. There was no trouble about conviction this time and the innocent cowpuncher went his way. The youthful sheriff received a conciliatory pat upon the back from old Judge Gainsworthy, who winked and looked the other way when Frank's arm stole about his daughter.

IN ANOTHER'S NEST (April 17).—Old Ben Radway, millionaire by right of strength, sickened of his vain wife and two selfish children, went for a long stroll in the mountains and there met Ralph Cunningham, a hearty, clear-eyed youth who bade him welcome. Across the range lived pretty Jessie, much beloved by Ralph, but coquettishly refusing his advances. The old man was so much affected by the heartiness, wholesomeness and clean living of the mountain folk that he wrote back home telling his wife that he proposed to disinherit them and spend the remainder of his days in the mountains.

Mrs. Radway called a conference. Her son, Charles, and daughter, Louise, sulked at one end of the table while Mrs. Radway laid down the law. There was but one thing to do, she said, and that was for the two children to marry Ralph and Jessie. So they went into the mountains, induced the unspohisticated couple to accompany them home and promptly dressed them in the latest clothes and taught them the polished manners of society. Alas, the mountains called strongly and one day Ralph, strolling throughout the gardens in an agonizing coat and collar, saw Charley attempt to kiss Jessie. A second later and the mountain couple were on their way back to the hills. And then Jessie found her heart and courage to whisper her secret into the delighted ear of her mountain lover.

THE WAYS OF FATE (April 19).—Two men playing cards, the argument, flash of a revolver, and one lay dead. The murderer homeward fled, hurried his little girl baby into a west-bound train and was heard of no more.

The years passed and boyish Jim Conway grew to manhood with the sole purpose of seeking out his father's murderer to deal justice to him. He went West and was one day lost in the mountains. He called for help and help came in the form of a sweet-faced woman who led him to her home. He spent the flying weeks with her and the aged father, learned to love the mountain nymph for her beauty of soul and fair face. One day she asked him his reasons for being in the hill country, and he, loverlike, confided his secret. Behind the door, sat the white-haired father. He rose, shook himself like a leaf as he invited the young man into the house. And there he confessed the deed, baring his chest for the expected blow. But none fell for love had sweetened the poison of his thought.

MAJESTIC.

THE HALF ORPHANS (April 6).—Mr. Beaumont, widower, is much in love with Mrs. Lovejoy, widow. Both are very anxious to appear young in the other's eyes, but are burdened with full-grown children, Mr. Beaumont, a son, Mrs. Lovejoy a daughter. So they dress them like small children, much to the disgust of the boy and girl. Mrs. Lovejoy gives a dinner to announce her engagement to Mr. Beaumont. The children wish to attend but are told they are too little. Indignant,. they plan to get even. Taking the butler into their confidence, they go to the dinner as colored waiters. When the announcement is made, they exclaim, "Bless you, my children." The boy slaps his father on the back and the girl kisses her mother. Confusion follows in which they make their escape. The next morning, when the widower calls on the widow, the children enter, the girl dressed in her mother's clothes, and the boy in his father's. They hand a bundle to the widow and another to the widower, which contain the waiter's clothes, acknowledging they played the prank. Then they issue their intimation that they are grown up and going to stay grown up or they will elope.

THE NIGHT RIDERS (April 8).—Mr. Harvey, a planter, for some trifling neglect of duty, is about to beat one of his negro employees, but Kate Harvey, his daughter, interferes and saves Tom from a beating.

Later, the Night Riders decide to punish Harvey for selling his cotton and tobacco at his own price. Tom overhears the threats against Harvey and starts off to warn him and his daughter. He meets Kate on the way from home visiting friends, and knowing the danger to her at her father's house, he, without her consent, forcibly takes her to the cabin of a negro mammy. Two black boys see this forced abduction, as they think, and run off to tell Harvey. In the meantime, the Night Riders have decoyed Harvey from his home and are about to beat him up when the black boys come on, and Harvey and the rest of the white men forgetting their differences, start out in search of the black fiend, as they think.

Tom, having left Kate in the cabin, starts out to warn her father, but is met by the black boy, who tells him the white men will lynch him first, and then find out whether he is guilty or not afterwards. Tom realizes the danger and hides in the swamps and woods. The black boy goes on to Kate and tells her Tom's danger. She starts out to save Tom and arrives just as her father and the lynching party are about to hang or burn Tom. She explains the situation and of course, all ends well.

MUTUAL EDUCATIONAL.

WILLY AND THE CONJUROR (April 17).—Willy wasn't very proud when he arrived home, for once again he was at the bottom of his class. As punishment his parents informed him that he would not be allowed to see the Conjuror, who was to entertain them that evening, nor would he be given any cakes from the little tea party. But while his parents were receiving the guests, Willy, who had been put to bed, made up his mind that he would attend the party. He climbed through the window and managed to hide himself under the table in the drawing-room, just before the Conjuror arrived and the guests came into the room. The Conjuror took a watch and informed the party that he would make it disappear. Willy managed to get his hands on the timepiece without being noticed and it did disappear. The guests applauded, but the Conjuror was quite perplexed.

Willy manager to perform several other tricks for the magician, much to the entertainment of the guests and to the discomfiture of the mystified maker of magic. When the Conjuror took a chair and placed it, ready to sit down, the chair suddenly moved out from under him, and then the table began to move across the room. There was a scramble on the part of the entire party to get out of the room as soon as possible. In a short time, however, they returned, but they could find no trace of anything supernatural about the table. The Conjuror then announced that he would have "Old Nick" himself appear. It happened that Willy found a Chinese mask hanging near and putting it on he made his appearance before the startled party as a vision brought by the magician. All the guests made a hurried exit and the "vision," holding the magician by the coat pulled him into the dining-room, where the two enjoyed the dinner which had been prepared by Willy's parents. Recovering their courage, the guests returned, armed with guns and sticks. When they found the two culprits eating up all the good things, an explanation was demanded. The Conjuror was dismissed and Willy was given a good thrashing.

VILLAGE CUSTOMS IN CEYLON, INDIA (April 17).—The Cingalese peasants are known to be the most civilized people of India. The tillers of the soil, tradesmen and artisans are very industrious people. While some of them are waiting for the next crop, others make palm mats to cover the houses. In this most entertaining and instructive subject we see typical blacksmiths shoeing buffalos and other peasants preparing the crops for the market. The Cingalese peasants send their children to school as soon as they can walk and the attention they pay to the teachers is wonderful. The older children are taught gymnastics and dancing occupies a great part of their time.

BRONCHO

A SOUTHERN CINDERELLA (3 parts—April 16).—Prior to the breaking out of the Civil War, Col. Dayton, a widower with an eighteen-year-old daughter, Eleanor, resides in the old homestead at Ridgeville, Va. He goes to Boston on a business trip, where he meets a widow with a daughter of the same age as Eleanor. The Colonel falls in love with the widow, and after a brief courtship they are married. His business requiring close attention, he sends his new wife to the old home.

Eleanor greets her stepmother and her stepsister, Maud, affectionately, but they treat her with disdain. Their haughty manners and overbearing manner gain for them the enmity of the negroes, and Eleanor's feelings are hurt when the new mistress of the house removes the picture of Eleanor's mother from the wall.

Col. Dayton returns home, and Mrs. Dayton pretends affection for Eleanor, while in his presence, and completely deceives the Colonel. Eleanor refrains from telling her father what she has suffered at the hands of the step relations, and on the declaration of war he goes to the front at the head of his regiment. Sensational scenes of battle are shown, in which the Colonel is engaged.

A month later the Northern troops capture Ridgeville and the boys in blue come triumphantly marching down the street. A loyal Southern woman defiantly unfurls the Confederate flag in her front yard and stands before it. The soldiers are prevented from doing her harm by Capt. Hammond, who gently takes the offending flag from her.

The Dayton homestead is utilized by the soldiers as headquarters, and Mrs. Dayton quickly tells them that she is a Northern woman and introduces her daughter. She is charmed by the courtly manner of the handsome Capt. Hammond, and gives him Eleanor's bedroom, forcing her to reside with the old Negro mammy.

Mrs. Dayton hopes to marry Maud to Capt. Hammond. Capt. Hammond, however, accidentally meets Eleanor at the well and falls in love with her, and the two meet clandestinely.

Col. Dayton persuades the Confederates to make an attack on Ridgeville and recapture it. Hammond, knowing how serious the battle will be, asks Eleanor to marry him and she consents. They are joined in wedlock by the minister. While the ceremony is taking place Col. Dayton's regiment make a brilliant attack upon the city. Capt. Hammond is trapped as he emerges from the minister's house with Eleanor, and the raging Colonel tries to get at him, but is restrained by Eleanor, who finally persuades her father to assist her husband to escape.

Eleanor tells her father of the inhuman treatment she has received at the hands of her stepmother and Maud, and the angry Colonel vows to avenge the wrongs done his child.

Capt. Hammond rejoins his command and tries to rally his demoralized men. The fighting is desperate, but nothing can stay the exultant Southern boys, and the Union retreat becomes a rout. Once more the stars and bars float over Ridgeville, and the Colonel is the idol of the hour.

Mrs. Dayton and Maud try to greet him affectionately. Bitterly he upbraids them for their conduct and declares: "The woman who cannot be a mother to my daughter cannot be a wife to me." Mrs. Dayton tries to plead with him, but he orders her from the house.

The years roll by, bringing with them peace. Once more the Colonel is at his home with Eleanor. Eleanor, looking out of the window, sees Capt. Hammond coming, and with a cry of joy rushes to the door to greet her husband. The Colonel, perplexed for a moment, decides to accept his son-in-law.

KEYSTONE.

A LIFE IN THE BALANCE (April 14).—The landlord of poor tenements rents rooms to three Italians. Not being impressed with their looks he spies upon them and discovers that they are making bombs. Securing a pistol he rushes into the room and chases them out. He then runs to the police station, but is kicked out by the cops who resent having their game of pinocle interfered with. The revengeful Italians enter the landlord's home while his wife has gone to the store and place their baby in a basket, which they attach to the end of a long spring, taken from an exerciser, and fasten the other end of the spring under the window so that when the window is raised it will permit the basket to fall four stories.

The landlord is waylaid and tied to a fence, his gloating captors telling him of what they have done. He is in agony and tugs at his bonds, and manages to get the rope in his mouth, which he vainly tries to chew in two. His wife returns home and missing the baby, thinks he has taken it out. Alternate flashes are shown of the woman in the house and the baby dangling at the end of the spring, and the audience is kept in an expectant frame by the wife going to the window to open it and having her attention distracted by various incidents in time to prevent her from raising the window.

A boy finally releases the frantic landlord, who rushes home just in time to save his child.

MURPHY'S I. O. U. (April 17).—Cohen holds the I. O. U. of Murphy, who is a policeman. Cohen presses for payment, and calls at the policeman's house. In desperation the cop gives Cohen his wife's jewelry and takes up the I. O. U. Mrs. Murphy misses the trinkets and raises a hullaballoo, reporting the supposed theft at the station. The sergeant assigns Murphy to the case, and he hunts up Cohen and vainly endeavors to persuade the loan man to return the jewelry. Murphy then gives his pistol to a tramp and tells him to hold up Cohen and take the jewelry away from him, which is done. Cohen rushes to the station and reports the robbery. Murphy gives the trinkets back to his wife and Cohen sees them in her hands and snatches them away. She pursues him and Murphy helps her catch Cohen. The sergeant also takes a hand, and Cohen tells the whole story, his statement being corroborated by the tramp, whom Murphy has kicked away, instead of rewarding him. Mrs. Murphy permits Cohen to keep the jewelry, but with a determined look in her eye she leads Murphy home by the ear, brandishing a heavy club.

A DOLLAR DID IT (April 17).—Schmidt and Riley are neighbors, and engage in a game of cards for $1. Schmidt catches Murphy cheating and a fierce battle ensues, in which the wives take part. They throw furniture, kitchen utensils, etc., at each other, and finally Murphy snatches a package of dynamite from a workman who has been blasting rock and throws it at Schmidt. Schmidt catches it in his hands, preventing an explosion, and throws it back at Murphy, who immediately hurls it again at Schmidt. It explodes, tearing a big hole in the earth, and Schmidt is seen buried in the ground, with his feet sticking up. Conscience-stricken, Murphy rushes out and pulls Schmidt out of the hole and revives him, and there is a happy reconciliation all around.

WHEN GHOST MEETS GHOST (April 6).—If you were a studious man, accustomed to burning the midnight oil, wouldn't it annoy you if each night at 12 precisely, the ghost of a melancholy maiden appeared, weeping and lamenting?

A certain professor was bothered this way. He was not afraid of ghosts and could have endured one whose specialty was silent haunting. He found, however, that the weeping maiden was a nuisance, and prevented him from concentrating. So he decided, ungallant though his conduct might be deemed, to get rid of her.

Being a learned man, the professor knew that King Solomon used to cork wicked spirits in bottles and throw them into the sea. The professor's ghost, however, was an uneasy shade. He threw it into the sea, he buried it in the ground, but each midnight it would reappear and make the welkin ring with weeping and lamentation.

Harsh measures having failed, the professor decided to see if love could subdue a tearful ghost. In a house near the professor's was the spirit of "the youthful knight." Nobody knew why he returned to earth, and he was not popular. Clad in full armour he clanked about the house, scowling fiercely. He was a regular kill joy, and tenants moved promptly after seeing him. Just the same the valiant professor decided to call upon the youthful knight. He carried the white lady with him—in a whiskey bottle—which, by the way, is an appropriate place for spirits. When the youthful knight appeared, the professor set the other ghost free, and was charmed to see that they were mutually attracted.

Were his troubles over? Far from it. Unfortunately the ghosts were grateful, and decided, as a mark of their appreciation, to make their home with the professor. Then he moved in light marching order and hastily, for being a learned professor he feared that his residence might become the headquarters for union ghosts.

THE PATRIOT (April 8).—The storekeeper was the biggest man in Cranberry Centre, and his neighbors were convinced that he would be a political hero some day. He dutifully attended all conventions of his party, was on terms of personal friendship with the legislative candidates (during campaigns) and each day became more and more convinced that the fate of the republic rested heavily upon his shoulders.

When his party assumed power at Washington, after many long years, the idol of Cranberry Centre decided that his services were needed at the Nation's capitol. His wife protested that it would be far better for him to remain at home and attend to business, but he overruled her. He was absolutely convinced that the new president needed him, so he determined to sacrifice himself upon the altar of his country.

A delegation of his admiring neighbors cheered him as he departed, but the cheers were not echoed when he arrived in Wassington. He found that city plumb full of patriots who were trying to save the country, and no one seemed to want the big man from Cranberry Centre. At first he had fondly hoped to be urged to accept a cabinet position, but as the weeks went on he would have taken a place as janitor had it been offered. His money ran out, and appeals to his wife for more brought no response. She was convinced that he was squandering their savings upon "pesky politicians," so contented herself with advising him to come home. He did, but was compelled to walk.

There was no crowd out to greet him when he limped into Cranberry Centre over the ties. Everybody was in at the storekeeper's home, as he discovered later. He arrived just in time to witness the conclusion of the marriage ceremony which united his daughter to a young farmer. In days gone by the storekeeper had scouted the idea of such an alliance, being determined that his girl should be the bride of a statesman. Now, wiser by sad experience, he uttered no protest, and at the same time solemnly swore that he would cease being a patriot and devote all his attention to the mercantile business.

THE CHANGELING (April 11).—A millionaire's little son, while out walking with his nurse, slipped away and mysteriously disappeared. Detectives scoured the country far and wide, but without result. Finally the conclusion was regretfully reached that the little chap must be dead, for the handsome rewards offered for his recovery would have tempted any one who knew of his whereabouts.

An unscrupulous woman, who lived by her wits, read an account of the affair, and was amazed by the startling resemblance the missing boy bore to her own son. She decided to take advantage of the likeness, and presented herself at the wealthy widower's home with her son. The child was at once accepted as the missing heir. The millionaire offered her employment as nurse to his "son," and the woman and her child seemed assured of comfort and luxury as long as they lived.

The millionaire's child had not died. When he ran away from his nurse he hid in a freight car, intending to frighten her, but the joke became serious when the train started and he was unable to get off. A surly brakeman put him off the train many miles from his home. Later the little fellow was injured in an accident and was cared for by a kindly farmer's family. He was unconscious for weeks, and when he recovered he found that no one would credit his assertion that he was a millionaire's son. His clothes were ragged and shabby now, and he looked like a beggar boy.

But the boy had a good deal of pluck, and he finally got home, although he had to walk a good part of the way. The scheming woman realized that he was the rightful heir and tried to bar him from his home, but he forced his way in and the puzzled father had to choose between two boys who were alike as two peas. But the youngster's pet dog recognized his little master at once, and hurled himself upon him with yelps of joy, and the boy soon convinced his father that he had been the victim of a deception. "The Changeling" was a very surly boy, quite different from the cheery temperament of his real son, and the father had often grieved over his boy's changed disposition. The adventuress and her son left the home which they had grown to look upon as their own and were never heard from again.

THE QUALITY OF KINDNESS (April 1).—Tiny Tim's parents are hard pressed for money, and their creditors are very persistent in being "paid off." The father receives a letter from his brother, residing in America, and whom he has not seen in ten years. Laboring under the hallucination that the uncle is rich, they receive a severe blow to the contrary when the relative arrives, for he is dead broke. The father and mother get so disgusted with uncle's table manners that they leave the house. Being left alone with his uncle, Tiny Tim gives him a fistful of cigars and some of his pennies. farewell. Then the sheriff's men enter and as they are in the act of seizing the furniture, one of them discovers Tiny Tim's bank, in which uncle had placed a check for $25,000, with a note reading:

"My Dear Tiny Tim:—If your parents are selfish, you, anyway, have a heart of gold. I am rich, and that is why I give you a check for $25,000. UNCLE RICHARD, The Tobacco King."

The creditors are paid and father and mother congratulate themselves on having such a smart and wealthy son.

MARRIAGE BY THE WHOLESALE (April 3).—Two couples meet at the marriage factory. This is the city hall, Bureau of Licenses.

By coincidence the couples meet again in the theater. There is more trouble. Both couples go to a hotel. There is only one billiard table. Both bridegrooms want to play at the same time. There is only one bedroom in the house. There are many flying fists and black eyes, scratched faces and pulled hair is distributed with the greatest prodigality. The police are called in and all four are hauled off to jail.

LUX.

THE LEOPARD AVENGER (April 18).—The story of an old chemist, who takes his daughter and a devoted band of assistants into the heart of Africa in order that he may pursue his scientific studies unmolested; of how he learns the secret of making diamonds and of a dastardly attempt to rob him of his secret by the head of a big diamond trust is, in itself alone, a thrilling one. But to this is allied an exciting story of a leopard hunt, of the chase and the capture of the beast after it has been badly wounded. Through the careful nursing of the chemist's daughter, the leopard is restored to its former good health, and becomes as docile as a great domestic cat. When the agent of the diamond trust comes to steal the secret, he is confronted by the great leopard, who attacks him, and, after a deadly struggle, the thief and the avenger lie lifeless upon the ground.

SOLAX.

THE MYSTERY OF THE LOST CAT (April 16).—While Mrs. Ray is getting supper for her pet cat it disappears. She calls up Burstup Homes, the detective, who comes to Mrs. Ray's apartment and examines the rooms. He examines the cat's paw prints, finds cat's hair and a piece of music entitled "And the Cat Came Back." These he considers invaluable clues. On the floor below he finds a man playing "And the Cat Came Back." This suspect offers a connecting link in his chain of evidence and so he lassoes him and after tying up the musician, he proceeds to secure further evidence. He continues on his way through the building and arrests many persons on trivial clues. Finally Burstup reaches the basement, where he finds four crooks, three men and a woman, quarreling about a fur piece. Burstup sees the fur and thinks it is the cat's skin, appropriates it and arrests the crooks and drags them along with his other suspects to the police station. In the meantime, Mrs. Ray's cat comes back and she goes to the police station and advises Burstup, and all the prisoners are consequently discharged by the judge and Burstup leaves amidst jeers.

WHERE LOVE DWELLS (April 18).—Mrs. Barton, rich and snobbish, writes her poor sister that she will give the latter's daughter, Jennie, a home with her. Jennie, a beautiful, happy creature, does not care to go, but her parents, realizing the opportunity, insist and Jennie, with heavy heart, leaves for her new home. Arrived, the Barton's coldness, formality and artificiality, chill and stun her and she longs for her humble home.

One night, at a reception given in honor of the noble Barry Lee, Mrs. Barton insists that Jennie wear one of Flora's cast off gowns, and Jennie, obeying, makes a ridiculous appearance. The guests secretively laugh and twit her and file into the ballroom, leaving her alone, After the first sting of the humiliation has passed, Jennie rebels, dresses herself in one of her simple, home-made dresses, descends again to the drawing room and makes a complete conquest of all the men and especially Barry Lee, whom Flora hopes to win. Lee makes love to Jennie, but she, believing him engaged to Flora, repulses him just as Mrs. Barton and Flora surprise them. The latter are furious, denounce Jennie and pack her off to her room.

Jennie, hurt and indignant, packs her valise to go. Barry, learning of her decision, and in spite of Mrs. Barton's and Flora's efforts to detain him, offers to take Jennie to her home. She reluctantly consents, and there at last she is happy again in the little home where love dwells.

THE TEMPEST.—Owing to the deep interest Prospero, Duke of Milan, took in his studies, he neglected to attend to the affairs of state. His brother, Antonio, seeing this soon had him deposed, and later managed to set him and his little daughter, Miranda, adrift. After drifting for several days, the castaways were washed upon an island inhabited by an evil spirit named Sycorax. Prospero, by his knowledge of magic, released the good spirit, Ariel, who promised to do anything for Prospero. Prospero lived for many years in this strange, little dominion, and one day with the aid of Ariel he conjured up the Court of Naples and learned that the King was making preparations for a voyage to negotiate for the marriage of his daughter to the Prince of Tunis. With the aid of the spirits, Prospero ordered a tempest raised which cast the passengers on the island, each ignorant as to the safety of the other. Prince Ferdinand, on his way to Prospero, met Miranda. They fell in love immediately. At the words of Prospero, Ariel brought all the survivors to the grotto of Prospero. They did not recognize him, not even his own brother. He retired for a moment and reappeared in his former robes of state. Recognition was instantaneous and they begged forgiveness. Great was the joy of the King when he saw his son, the Prince, with Miranda, and he agreed on the betrothal of the pair.

Gentlemen:

We beg to advise that the Curtain I installed in the Rex Theater, Syracuse, is giving great satisfaction.

The Curtain installed in the Standard Theater, Syracuse, on approval, is simply great; the management, Mr. Bastable, states it cut the juice bill 50 per cent. Still gives a brighter picture than previously obtained on direct current.

Yours very truly.

Simplex

inspires the operators to poetical outbursts

What other motion picture projector can do as much?

The following contribution has been received from Mr. Kenneth G. MacLean, now of Yuma, Arizona, member of I. A. T. S. E. Local 150, of Los Angeles, and illustrates the operator's confidence in the Simplex:

Look! cried the boss on the opening night;
Look at that picture, so steady and bright.
Sure! said the operator, all serene,
That's what to expect with the SIMPLEX machine.

We have previously advised the operators to get better acquainted with the Simplex. We now repeat that the Simplex means more to the operator than you now realize. It is a projector in the full sense of the word, and will be a lasting delight to the man who owns or runs one.

Hallberg A. C. to D. C. and D. C. Economizer

This is HALLBERG'S A. C. to D. C. ECONOMIZER.

Many of the most prominent theatres in the country have installed the Hallberg, and I have received hundreds of inquiries regarding this much talked of device during the past few weeks. The splendid light and beautiful pictures it helps project either forces competitors out of business or compels them to also install this Hallberg A. C. to D. C. Economizer. After all, the pictures are what you are selling; if you are operating on alternating current and wish to get the best results, I offer you the logical solution of your problem. Write stating your voltage, cycles, phase of your current and length of throw. Will quote price then on outfit to meet your requirements.

Brand new series

¶ Filipino War, Spanish-American War, Etc. ¶

UNIVERSAL FILMS TRADE MARK

We are going to give you an entire change of program in war stories. We are going to send every Universal exhibitor into ecstasies of delight over a brand new series about to be released. Other manufacturers will follow the Universal's lead as usual, but you can absolutely depend upon the Universal to produce vastly superior quality in every detail. Watch! Wait!

Two "Crystals" Every Week!

Lovers of the popular "Crystal" films will be delighted to learn that we have completed arrangements for TWO "Crystals" per week instead of one. The new plan will take effect May 27th. After that you will get a "Crystal" every SUNDAY and every TUESDAY. Further particulars will be announced later.

"Mathilde"

2-reel Eclair

On April 23rd we release the Eclair's great dramatization of Eugene Sue's masterpiece, "Mathilde." This takes the place of an American-made Eclair which the Eclair people refused to release because it was not up to their high standard. See that you get "Mathilde" by all means!

"In Slavery Days"

2-reel Rex

Of all the powerful Rex releases of the past few weeks this is one of the very best. It is a Mississippi River story in two reels. A strong story, strongly enacted and produced with that extreme care for detail which has given the Rex a world-wide reputation. Demand it!

"Robespierre"

3-reel Imp

This is one of the most lavish productions the Imp Company ever attempted—a story of the French revolution which required extravagant costuming and great crowds of people. Make a memorandum this minute, so you won't forget to demand an early booking of "Robespierre"!

Two "Frontiers"

Every Week

Don't forget that hereafter there are TWO "Frontier" releases instead of one every week. Thursday and Saturday are "Frontier" days. See that you get "The Burning Lariat," the first of the Saturday "Frontiers." The new "Frontier" takes the place of the "Mecca" brand, discontinued.

Look Out For Fake Films!

Several cheap and trashy brands of film are being dumped onto the market and offered to exhibitors as part of the Universal program. They are made from negatives which we wouldn't accept as a gift. Make sure that you get genuine Universals. Insist on having "Universal films and nothing else!"

The Masterpiece of the

NO work of fiction has been more widely read than the renowned dramatic novel "Les Miserables," from the pen of Victor Hugo. Its characters are so true to nature that they have made the whole world kin. The rich and the poor alike have followed the fortunes of the god-like Valjean, and when he lay down his weary frame for his last long rest, they have sighed in sorrow for the loss of a dear friend. They have pitied poor Fantine; they have deplored the cruel Javert; shuddered at Thernadier, and rejoiced with Cosette. All these characters are wonderfully enacted true to all conceptions by a splendid cast of the best known European artists.

THE WORLD HAS EVER SEEN

THIS production is a big theatre attraction in every sense of the word, yet it is divided into four sections as in the book itself, each part being a complete story. This fortunate arrangement makes the production available for one full evening's entertainment, or for four short entertainments on consecutive days. The aggregate length is 11,000 feet. Allowing 15 minutes for each 1000 feet, the full running time is 2 hours, 45 minutes. The most elaborate set of lithographs and small printed matter that can be had will accompany this production.

Where Negative is STUDIED, Developed and Printed, piece by piece, to Obtain the Uttermost Results — Countless Mechanical Devices — Experienced, Dependable Help Aid in Giving You a Finished Product Impossible to the Hurry-Up Maker of Alleged "Feature Pictures."

This is a Vital Thought Worth Absorbing—The reputable manufacturer, releasing a stated number of weekly releases, is surrounded by an organization where each department head is dependent on the other—hence, isn't it logical to suppose that such singleness of purpose can produce more for you than the hastily organized "feature company" who must go to the ESTABLISHED manufacturer to develop and print his negative?

Week-in-and-out efficiency is possible only to regular releasing companies.

"BOOBS AND BRICKS"

(Release Monday, April 21, 1913.)

A Kerrigan, Van Trump and Richardson comedy. The female salesperson comes to Podunk—and leaves with a trail in her wake of broken Podunk hearts and pocketbooks. A clever, laughable story.

"WHEN JIM RETURNED"

(Release Thursday, April 24, 1913.)

Jim comes back from college. The ranch boys try some funny stunts, but Jim wins the girl and all the bouquets after all.

"CALAMITY ANNE'S TRUST"

(Release Saturday, April 26, 1913.)

Sad-Eyed O'Brien dies and leaves a will and a ward to Calamity. Calamity proves herself some protectress of the helpless female young and some match-maker, believe us. The funniest kind of story featuring that funniest of characters, Louise Lester, as Calamity Anne.

Each of these offices is in charge of a manager whose chief duty it is to see that General Film Service is satisfactory in every way to those who use it. Any exhibitor who questions the sincerity of this statement, is invited to try out the Service for his own good, and ours.

Facts and Comments

WE have never joined in the prejudice with which theatrical journals seem to regard all new-comers in their field. Such prejudice is probably born of conceit and egotism. Experience has shown time and again that men on the borderland of middle age have done great things in the theatrical field without much previous theatrical experience. The same holds good of the motion picture. Both the art of producing and the profession of exhibiting may be learned by anybody with the proper talents in him. Some practical experience, however, is indispensable. We have seen grocers, plumbers, tailors and business men generally go into the motion picture industry and be fairly successful. They were always willing to learn, and thus there was no trouble about laying a foundation. We would advise such entrants into the moving picture field to leave the details of practical management to trained men, and not interfere in the beginning of their new enterprise. It is unfortunately not rare that these inexperienced men hamper capable managers with their crude notions. But recently a case was pointed out to the writer, in which the owner of a place who had amassed a fortune in the hotel business paid a manager a salary, but gave him no power whatever, substituting his own new-born ideas for the ripened judgment of the experienced man. The science of conducting a motion picture theater is not revealed to mortals in a dream, but has to be learned like everything else in this plug-away world.

A MOST interesting conversation took place the other day in the editorial sanctum of a great New York daily newspaper. It related to an experiment made by that same paper. The experiment was the introduction of a weekly moving picture supplement. The editor had been in fear lest his "high class readers" resent such an innovation. "To my surprise," he said to his friend, "all our readers commended our step and urged us to keep it up. Our circulation jumped noticeably. I see motion pictures in a new light now, and realize as I never did before their widespread popularity."

No one is gladder of this publicity for the motion picture than we are. Though their influence is confined to narrow limits compared to the national scope of THE MOVING PICTURE WORLD, much good may reasonably be expected from the attention the motion picture is receiving from the daily press. They create and stimulate interest in kinematography, and thus help both producer and exhibitor. As a rule these local publications do not even pretend to reach the exhibitor; they utterly lack the equipment, the experience and the connection to be of practical value to the exhibitor and the advertiser, to whom nothing can replace the real organ of the industry covering a field perhaps twenty times larger than the zone of the newspaper which is printed exclusively for the benefit of the general public.

THE telephone girls of Boston have protested through the press against being shown in motion pictures in the act of constantly chewing gum. This may seem funny to persons who find it easier to laugh than to think, but we believe that these girls have a just cause of complaint. It is a very cheap sort of wit to which they are subjected. Naturally they like to be well thought of, and they like to keep their self-respect. Civilization could not live through one day without their help. Acts of heroism in times of distress and emergency are often credited to telephone girls, as witness the recent disasters in the Middle West. These clownish jokes do not look well on the screen.

KINEMAPHOBIA—an unreasoning hostility to the motion picture—seems to have reached its highest mark in the city of Pittsburg. The exhibitors in the smoky town, animated by a proper spirit of helpfulness, had proposed to give special performances on a Sunday, intending to devote the entire proceeds to the relief fund for the victims of the recent floods. Both the human and the divine law recognize that it is lawful to do good on the "Sabbath," but the Pittsburg ministers did not read the gospel that way. The supposed desecration of the "Sabbath" outweighed in their minds any possible good that might come out of these performances. Unanimously they protested against the Sunday exhibition, charity or no charity. The exhibitors, however, refused to be intimidated. Sunday exhibitions were held and the police did not dare to molest them. The world is still running on at much the same gait, in spite of the ravings of these antediluvian fanatics.

The Future of the Single Reel

By W. Stephen Bush.

LESS than three years ago the single reel held absolute sway. Old moving picture men will easily recall the wonder expressed in film exchanges, when the Pathe "Dreyfus Case" was released. This splendid feature ran but a couple of hundred feet over one reel and the short end had an old-fashioned "comedy" for a running mate. Exhibitors were puzzled as to how it should be put on, but most of them guessed right and waited awhile before they let the tear-stained climax of the tragedy be followed by the farce. Nobody then thought much about features and the possibilities of the multiple reel. "The Fall of Troy" was among the early features consisting of more than one reel.

Then along toward 1911 multiple releases became more frequent, but they were still looked upon as exceptions, and there were few indeed who then anticipated the coming rise and development of the multiple feature reel. Multiple releases were given to the exhibitor in installments, the continuity of the subject to the contrary notwithstanding. In that shape they were anything but welcome to the exhibitor, who had to hear frequent complaints from his audience because subjects of multiple reels were split up and often released at intervals of a week and more. When producers at last began to heed the demands of the public and the repeated urgings of this paper and decided to release multiple reels on one and the same day there were many vaudeville houses which sandwiched acts of vaudeville into reels treating the same subject. We mention all this just to show what a novelty the feature reel was in those days and how long it took for producer and exhibitor to properly adjust themselves to the new conditions.

On June 17, 1911, The Moving Picture World said in its editorial columns: "The present upward trend of the moving picture could not be shown more strikingly than by grouping together the titles of the following films released recently or about to be released: 'The Fall of Troy,' 'A Tale of Two Cities,' 'Enoch Arden,' 'The Battle Hymn of the Republic,' 'The Maccabees' and 'Faust.' " We prophesied the further rapid development of the feature films in the same article in these words: "It is * * * characteristic of the present higher ideals that of the subjects above mentioned one consists of three reels and two consist of two reels each. The two and three reel subject is indeed a necessary product of the higher ideal. It is bound to come, and in two or three years it will be the rule rather than the exception in all dramas."

Events have literally verified this prediction. I believe that on the whole the quality of the feature reels has been above that of the single reel, though the feature reel has lately gone to inferior sources for its material and inspiration. The fond hope that the feature and the higher ideals would become synonymous has not been entirely fulfilled. European productions especially have too often departed from the higher ideals in the selection of subjects for multiple reels.

With the feature still holding the center of the stage and with every prospect of continuing to hold it for many years to come the question will occur to every exhibitor: What is to be the future of the single reel? The studios and equipments of every producer who issues regular releases every week is especially adapted for the making of single reels. The great fortunes in the manufacturing branch have in the last five years been made through the production of single reels. To the men who supply the staple of the exhibitor's program the feature is, as a rule, a thing most difficult of achievement. They look at the film situation from an angle wholly different from that of the feature men. It is well nigh impossible to put out a weekly supply and at the same time astonish the film world with wonderful features. There are some producers, not too many of them, who have foreseen the coming triumph of the feature and who have prepared special facilities for the production of features, entirely separate and distinct from their equipment for single reels. Such producers are the exceptions rather than the rule. The great majority of manufacturers will for a long time to come be dependent for their financial success and their artistic reputation on single reels.

It seems plain that the diminished demand for single reels will suffer still greater diminution unless the average of quality in the single reel takes a quick and decided turn for the better. In the regular single reel issues of certain producers there is about as much variety and interest as in the links of a chain of sausages. When one remembers to what heights of artistic achievements the industry rose in the days of the exclusive reign of the single reel, it is strange that there has been so much retrogression.

It would be easy to recall instances of splendid single reels. Take for example the old Shakespearean series of the Vitagraph Company, which no multiple Shakespearean reel since made has ever been able to approach in dramatic power and condensation; take the famous old Biographs such as "Pippa Passes," "The Greaser's Gauntlet" and scores of others, which were the delight of the public and the exhibitor. The old companies still release an occasional fine single reel, but on the whole even their single reel issues have shown meager quality, while of the newer companies scarcely one can lay claim to even a fair average of quality in the single reels. Originality of invention and dramatic power are sadly lacking.

We hope the day will never come when the single reel can be considered as little more than a "filler." There is to say the least as much chance for a display of directorial skill in the making of the single reel as there ever was. No matter how many features may be produced hereafter and how good such features may prove to be, the single reel will continue to be the backbone of the motion picture show. That show will in the end be judged by its single reels. If these are given over entirely to the exploitation of cheap comedy and cheap melodrama it will be a sorry day for the exhibitor and the public.

The coming of features consisting of eight reels and even twelve reels will undoubtedly have a tendency to decrease the demand for the single reel. Such features will establish new standards in kinematography. If the difference in quality between these very big productions and the every day single reel release is too pronounced it is not at all improbable that the single reel will lose in popular favor and will be relegated to the very cheapest of motion picture theaters. There is but one way to prevent this. The single reel must conform to higher standards. Its place in the kinematographic procession must not be too far in the rear of the modern feature of many reels.

Peering Into the Future

By Louis Reeves Harrison.

WHETHER high or low, nearly every jack in the game of life who is not a moral idiot is trying to improve. Even the money drudge realizes that those who are not after his gelt, the best people he can cultivate, care less for what he has than for what he is when they come to meet him socially, and he strives accordingly to purchase a character. I may therefore be excused for insisting upon progression and improvement in our picture plays, for applying the tonic of criticism so that they may meet the dominant sentiment of what is best in our times.

The plays themselves are critical. The finest of them are commentaries on the passing show, and they must reflect ideals based on principles of justice and equity to attain success with our people. When photodramas are not governed by high principles they should be called to account for common financial interest to the ultimate benefit of the public. Criticism based on high standards is as inevitable as it is essential. Even to think of these photoplays is to judge them.

It is essential that they keep pace with the times, and possible that some of them may strike out boldly as leaders of opinion, though the bare idea of adventuring into the future may get on the nerves of old showmen. Old showmen are timid for a reason. The natural drift of pictures is toward the drama, and theatrical men of other days are so constituted mentally as to go back into the past for their material, this being the line of least resistance. To the non-progressive spirit of those earliest in the game may be ascribed the present imitative mediocrity.

Imitative mediocrity characterizes a large number of the unsatisfactory pictures thrown on the screen—pictures that would cause the whole business to collapse like a house of cards but for a few notable exceptions, and persistence in this wearisome quality is now keeping many away from screen exhibitions who would otherwise attend. Producers are willing to spend money, but they are almost unanimous in believing that they are addressing audiences of inferior quality, and this idea is fostered by exchange men and exhibitors themselves.

The impression is a false one that people attending picture shows are lacking in sufficient intelligence to appreciate the best offerings; that the condition of working people is that of eternal damnation in poverty and ignorance; that they cannot rise, or stay "risen" when lifted up. The difference between the highly educated and the indifferently educated is not one of intellect at all; it is simply one of familiarity with the products of human achievement, a condition to be improved rather than fostered by moving pictures.

If the past is of any particular use it should teach us what the future is to be. Every American of Colonial descent knows that his ancestors were mostly men and women who resented old world distinctions of classes and masses. Our plain ancestors rose to a control of social and national affairs that excited the admiration of thinking men all over the world, though they were considered abroad to be inferior to lords temporal and spiritual, just as motion picture audiences are lightly regarded today.

Those who attend the picture shows because they cannot afford costly forms of entertainment may suffer from a form of social inequality not unlike the civil and political inequality of rebellious spirits who conquered and defended this country, but history has taught us that this form of disability is not inherent, nor is it beyond remedy. Modest workers who spend their dimes at the little shows are as far from being stupid as those who sit in the golden horseshoe at the Metropolitan are from being truly intellectual, and that is putting it strong.

The educational value of moving pictures was pointed out and discussed in these columns years ago, and now every play that presents a figment of historical information, whether or not it is correct or worth disseminating as a matter of knowledge, is tabbed "educational." Meanwhile not a grain of information is offered on subjects engaging the attention of rich and poor in all parts of the world. Scarcely a suggestion is made as to the outcome of fascinating questions of the hour. Though thought rules the world, few of the highest and brightest ideas of this hour are ever set forth on the screen.

The plain truth is that no people are more bitterly aware that our present social and political systems are faulty than those who suffer pain and humiliation from an unjust distribution of the fruits of achievement. They are more alive to the necessity of changed conditions and more ardent in the pursuit of new freedom than those who do not feel the need of it themselves and only once in a while regard it as essential to common welfare. There are hundreds of interesting problems presented by the struggle for greater opportunity, superior education and whatever is calculated to add to human wealth, power and happiness in equitable degree—problems which may be set forth in a thousand interesting ways—and any just presentation of these would go straight to the hearts of the average audience at motion picture shows.

Moving pictures should be agents of civilization, no matter where they are shown. Men have found old ideas of morality and justice to be false. Men are beginning to think that our present ideas need improvement; they are beginning to regard whatever is degenerate in national and social affairs with more disgust than open crimes excite; they are beginning to distrust those who make and enforce laws, and we all realize that a nation which cannot retain its progressive spirit is on the road to decay. Moving pictures may be destined to provide the real literature of opportunity.

The people are ready. They are quite capable of understanding and studying any problem presented clearly on the screen, and the first man to go before them with a vigorous plea for what is right and nearest the universal heart will fill the little places of entertainment to overflowing, and with thunders of applause. The question of whether the cowboy catches the Indian, or the tin-starred sheriff catches the villain, or the cop catches the burglar is not going to hold us much longer. "Tomorrow is the eventful thing for us. There lies all that remains to be felt by us and our children and those that are dear to us."

One of the most brilliant writers of today, H. G. Wells, says: "We look back through the countless millions of years and see the will to live struggling from shape to shape, from power to power, crawling, then walking, now struggling to master the air; now creeping down into the deep; we see it reshape itself anew; we watch it draw nearer and more akin to us, expanding, elaborating itself, pursuing its relentless purpose, until at last it reaches us and its being beats in our brains and arteries, roars through our cities, sings in our music, and flowers in our art." Is this the end? He answers, "It is possible to believe that all the past is but the beginning of a beginning, that all that is and has been is but the dream before the awakening, the twilight before the dawn."

"The Miser's Millions"

Three-Reel Cines-Kleine Feature.

Reviewed by James S. McQuade.

IT is said that the principal actor in the Cines-Kleine, three-reel feature "The Miser's Millions," designed the ingenious mechanical contrivances used in the production. Indeed, without these electrically operated properties the story might never have been written, or, at least, it would never have been used in a photoplay. It has been an easy matter to write a story around the mysterious cellar, which contains the miser's millions, when provided with the magically worked pieces of furniture and the awesome steel vault, provided with inflexible steel arms that spring out of the darkness and seize with a death grip the body of the burglar who is forcing an entrance to the treasure.

Scene from "The Miser's Millions" (Cines-Kleine).

Throughout the three reels of this feature film one's interest is well sustained, notwithstanding the fact that the secret working of the means of access to the treasure has been revealed in the first reel. Naturally the climax has been reached before the close of the third; but even this has its thrill, as it reveals the fearful ordeal to which a greedy money-maker is subjected and his utter collapse in the dread chamber of death. The second reel also has its stirring scene, in which the burglar is trapped by the ghostly steel arms while plying his jimmy on the vault.

Scene from "The Miser's Millions" (Cines-Kleine).

The character of the miser is strongly portrayed. The senility, cupidity and heartlessness of the money-mad man are drawn with artistic touches. His suspicious nature, too, is impressively revealed, and his tigerish fight for the preservation of the secret that protects his treasure is most realistic. Another well drawn character is that of the avaricious money lender. So despicable and cunning is he made to appear, one actually feels inclined to explode with malicious laughter, as he shrinks in horror from the skeleton that grins at him in the vault chamber. His utter despair, when he finds himself walled in with the gruesome dead and the millions he has attempted to steal, still further augments one's fiendish glee.

The interior scenes are well staged and show fine photography. The rescue of the child of the warden of the penitentiary is shown in an elaborate exterior setting. The partial collapse of the structure and the serious injury of the rescuer form an impressive scene.

The miser of the story lives in seculsion in his city home. No one save Peter, a butler, is allowed on the premises. His only relative is a niece, Mrs. Rice, whom he never sees. With her sick husband and their little daughter, Dorothy, Mrs. Rice finds it hard to keep the wolf from the door. Without medicine or food in the house, she sends a messenger to her uncle, pleading for assistance. It is the day for the miser's collection of his rents, and he is about to leave when the messenger arrives. He reads the note, and at first fumbles a few small coins in his fingers, then hesitates, and returns them to his pocket with the remark, "My rents are of more importance to me than my relatives."

The miser's hoard is stored in a large steel vault in his cellar. Access to this cellar is only possible through a secret passage, leading from his library. By touching a hidden button, one of the book cases sinks beneath the floor, revealing an opening in the wall back of it. Passing through this opening the book case resumes its former position. Other intricately constructed contrivances are eencountered before the cellar is reached, all of them yielding to the magic touch of the miser. The vault also opens to the touch of secret springs and is closed by the same means. If otherwise tampered with, strong steel arms encircle the intruder and crush his life out. The return to fresh air also requires a knowledge of secret springs, as all entrances have been closed, as the explorer, on his way to the cellar, passes through them. Thus a stranger may possess the secrets to gain entrance, and yet never get out.

Scene from "The Miser's Millions" (Cines-Kleine).

One day Peter, the butler, spies on his master and learns of the secret entrance. The old miser discovers him and attempts to shoot him. In the scuffle, the pistol is accidentally discharged and the miser is killed. Peter is sent to the penitentiary for 15 years.

Mrs. Rice and her child were living alone when informed of her uncle's death. Her husband had died some time before. On coming into possession of the estate, she could find no trace of the miser's hidden money. It was necessary to get loans on the real estate and, after the lapse of 15 years, she is again penniless. A money lender is about to foreclose on the property. The money lender's son is in love with Dorothy and tries in vain to turn his father from his course.

About this time Peter, the butler, is released. He calls on Mrs. Rice and draws her plans of the secret entrance. The money lender is told of these plans by his son and resolves to secure the treasure for himself. He gains entrance to the cellar but cannot return. Through Peter's efforts he is released, and the miser's millions are turned over to Mrs. Rice.

The release date is April 23.

FILM SUPPLY TO BE DISBANDED.

At a meeting of the directors of the Film Supply Company held on April 3, it was decided to dissolve that organization. The resignation of the general manager of the Company, Harry Raver, was accepted and a committee consisting of C. J. Hite and Herbert Blache was appointed to wind up the affairs of the concern.

British Trade Exhibition

Moving Picture Symposium in London—Fourteen Picture Theaters in One.

(Specially Reported By Our Own Representative.)

SATURDAY, March 22 will be an important date in the history of the moving picture industry in Great Britain, for on that day was opened in London, under most distinguished auspices, the first industrial exhibition ever held in this country in connection with development of the kinema as an educational, scientific and entertaining factor.

A good deal of misapprehension, however, has existed both in England and America respecting trade representation at the British International Kinematograph Exhibition and it is the unanimous opinion of many important men in the trade that the only deplorable circumstance of the enterprise is the aloofness of the British Film Manufacturers Association, which refuses to recognize officially the exhibition. Beyond this the organizer, Mr. Ernest Schofield, a gentleman with extensive experience here in the promotion of industrial exhibitions, has had every facility in his task from both the picture theater people and film producers and manufacturers. The admirable manner in which the larger producing syndicates have fallen in with the idea was most encouraging, and this fact was favorably commented upon at the opening ceremony, which was creditably performed by the well known educationalist Sir Albert K. Rollit. An exhaustive list of church, social and educational dignitaries appeared as patrons of the exhibition, and some of them actually participated along with prominent American and English trade representatives in its business management.

For this purpose the exhibition was divided into seven or eight sections, each with its own controlling committee. These lists are much too long to print here, but as an instance of the thoroughness and efficiency of this system it might be mentioned that no less than five University professors were identified with the educational section, two notable explorers and three geographers with the travel and scenic section, while several eminent politicians, clergymen and actors rendered valuable assistance in the social, religious and entertainment sections respectively. To follow the exhibition proper a general conference was held and this apparently constituted a valiant attempt to determine the status of the moving picture. The application of the kinema to every phase of science and learning, religion and politics, medicine and travel was discussed at length by experts, a few of the most notable participants being the Bishop of Birmingham, the Headmaster of Eton, Prof. R. A. Gregory, Prof. Lyde, Sir A. R. Rollitt, Sir F. F. Belsey and Sir John Kirk.

The Exhibits.

Undoubtedly the first and foremost exhibit in historic importance was that lent for the occasion by the moving picture pioneer, Mr. Friese Greene. As is well known in America it was Mr. Greene who made the first moving picture projector and showed it at the Chester Photographic Convention in 1890. Mr. Greene personally explained his apparatus at a private view and his "first machine in the world" looks very much like a combination of a magic wheel such as one finds in penny bazaars and an old lantern.

A notable feature of the exhibition was the manner in which the exhibits and stands were displayed in such a fashion as to make the whole show attractive to the man in the street and not necessarily confined in interest to those in the trade. The fourteen theaters were arranged in one long avenue and the stands were in the annexes. Many novelties in the form of kinema adaptations delighted the huge London crowd which visited Olympia on Easter Monday and probably the most popular was the moving picture target. It is really a combination between the moving picture show and the shooting gallery. Pictures are projected on to the screen in the ordinary course and the patrons shoot at the moving objects with rifles. As each shot goes through the screen a small hole of light is reflected from the back and by some ordinary synchronizing device the film in the gate stops dead at the precise second that the bullet pierces the screen. This shows exactly how and where the kinema-sportsman has hit his mark. I had several shots myself and successfully bagged seven cavalrymen, two aviators, four lions, a tiger, a motor omnibus, and a flamingo in ten minutes. The attendant promised to send along the skins. I have already heard from representatives of large amusement syndicates that the living target is to be the premier attraction on the South Shore at Blackpool (England's Coney Island), this summer.

Another attraction equally diverting to the multitude was the photo-acting competition, suggested no doubt by the recent offer of the Cines Co. of £1,000 for the best scenario. At one end of the hall was erected a stage fitted up like the average picture producing studio. Aspirants to photoplaying were invited to give the crowd below an exhibition of their powers in the fixed role of someone who receives a letter containing a legacy but which afterward turns out fictitious. The preliminary tests occupied the first four days and several thousands of amateur actors faced the dummy camera, including all persons from maid servants to society ladies, and even the manager of a provincial theater competed. The final will not be "played off" until next week and I hear that some arrangement is being made by British film manufacturers to give the successful players a practical opportunity to show what they can do.

Other competitions included a test for operators both at spool changing and in case of the film firing, and one for pianists who were required to sit down and improvise music to a film they had not seen before. Medals were awarded to the successful competitors in both cases.

Safety Films.

The recently formed "Boroid" company had a most interesting stand on which their new fireproof film base was demonstrated. I asked the manager in charge to "frizzle" a piece of the film, which he did, by holding six or seven inches in the flame of a large spirit lamp. Rightly enough the film frizzled but there was no trace of flame, and this was proved beyond doubt when he placed a piece upon some red-hot tin and still it only frizzled. A few other devices were on show, but were mostly of the nature of fire preventing attachments. One consisted of a steel jar to be attached to the side of the projector containing a chemical fire-extinguishing solution and which by pressing a lever was squirted into the "gate" of the machine and surrounding parts. I am afraid, however, that this device will never prove popular to operators averse to water as the demonstration resembled something like a miniature shower-bath. There was some talk at one time of submitting these and other appliances to the Royal Commission appointed to investigate celluloid dangers, but so far nothing has been heard of the matter; but the Berlin police, after subjecting Boroid film to most rigorous tests, have decided to grant extra privileges to theaters using it.

Sound Instruments.

It would seem from the many mechanical musical instruments shown at Olympia that, so far as the smaller shows are concerned, the orchestra will soon be swept out of existence. A most ingenious contrivance which attracted endless attention was a violin-playing instrument. The sceptic showman will ask "How can a machine draw a bow across a fiddle with accurate musical expression." That is not the point. The violin plays the bow, the latter remaining stationary throughout. The invention consists of a three-legged frame to which is attached three violins, close together and all in line. Across the three is stretched a huge bow and when the motor is set going and the sound regulator fed with paper music rools the three play together. Pneumatic stops regulate the strings instead of fingers.

The stentorian was another device which attracted endless notice. It was really an elaboration of the gramaphone except in stentorian notes which could be heard from one end of the building to the other. Combinations of pianos, organs, orchestrions and violins were exhibited by the dozen and all were under electric control, compact, and regulated on the press-the-button principle.

Machines for sound effects were as common as flies on a July morning and the cacophanic catastrophes produced by some were bewildering in the extreme. One small instrument, for instance, no larger than a sewing machine and known as the "Kinesounder," almost produced a panic. The operator pressed seven of its levers down simultaneously; then immediately fire alarms rang, police whistles blew, the fire engine hooter huzzed, horses galloped and vehicles rattled, timber cracked as though burning and passable imitations of falling floors and roofs were interspersed with many other noises of a fire scene. This machine produces about fifty other different stage noises with one of the most realistic resemblances of smashing crockery I have ever heard.

Trade Secrets.

Both in respect to projectors, cameras, and film producing apparatus columns could be written of new and improved adaptions on view at Olympia, but a few of the most notable must suffice. The newest thing in studio cameras resembled a big naval gun more than anything. It was constructed of heavy, thick steel and laid in a foundation of steel bedplates, while on all sides were myriads of handles and levers. The new gyroscope hand camera and one worked by compressed air were also exhibited. The camera used by Mr. H. Ponting near the South Pole attracted more than passing attention.

The process of artificially coloring films with stencil plates has hitherto been regarded as secret, but the "Pathecolor" system was openly demonstrated at the firm's stand. Several complicated machines were used for the stencil plates which were cut by means of the positive image of the film being projected on to ground glass, traced over with a pantograph, and the deflections of the needle transmitted to a second positive film, which is actually the stencil plate. To follow this through for the thousands of exposures on a short film would seem tedious, but the rapidity of the operator was amazing. When the stencils are cut they are fed in exact juxtaposition with an uncolored positive through a tinting machine which colors the films by running them in contact with bands soaked in aniline dyes. Only one color is applied at a time so that elaborately colored films must be run through the machine perhaps eight or ten times.

No advertising novelties of a sensational character were shown. The Essanay Co. had a huge balloon suspended from the roof, but most other firms depended upon throwaways or posters. The "Moving Picture World" along with a dozen other trade journals was represented and referred to eulogistically by the "Kinematograph Daily," a bright little daily record of the exhibition published by Mr. E. T. Heron.

Imagination in Picture Making

By Hanford C. Judson.

OBJECTIVITY and subjectivity are words that often change their meaning. At present, the former sometimes means an approach to the scientific method of producing an effect. There is not and never can be any science of art, because no two people are just alike and, roughly speaking, no two who are affected in the same way by anything. Yet in dramatic composition, within narrow limits, an approach to the scientific method seems possible. Every producer of melodrama knows that certain often-used formulas are sure to make human hearts tingle and that certain other formulas are sure to make human eyes weep.

We have our emotions, love and hate, exaltation and fear, joy and sorrow, and all the different shades of these, faith, hope, expectancy and that strange comer, pain, that has no opposite except forgetfulness. Besides these what else have we? It is with these and these alone that drama concerns itself. They are emotions; they come to us out of our motions, actions. Even where we stay motionless, life which is action moves against us and we are made to feel willy-nilly. If we move against the tide the action is fiercer and only when we move with it are we at relative rest. If life were simple and all its currents set in the same direction, we would all be alike and all would float down the same sleepy existence together, but the streams flow in all directions and there's clash and consequent feeling. It is this clash that drama strives to make effective to us on the screen.

The dramatist pictures his clash first subjectively to himself, then objectively works it up so that an audience, which isn't one man, but a collection of entirely different experiences, may be able to grasp the heart of it and place it each in his own life. The dramatist must pull it up out of all that pertains just to himself, and must keep only that which will seem approximately alike to all. He must make the clash clear and therefore make it simple—simpler than life. It must be more effective than life, for we are not all dramatists. The first difficulty with inexperienced producers is that they assume that the audience will imagine the conditions that make the situation possible and they begin their story with the things most interesting to themselves. We can't do this and are left cold. If he begins at the right place and makes his situation clear, he is apt, if the story is complicated, to try to tell it all, and so bring in a lot of things that, just at that time, are not at all significant. A young novelist is sure to write many scenes that add not a jot to the effect that he wants to create.

"To hold," as it were, "a mirror up to nature" was good advice from a critic of acting to players; but Shakespeare in his dramas did much more than hold a mirror. His plays are not even life as he saw it; for he worked with an object in view. Besides, they are dramatic and made more effective than life. Yet he holds the mirror up in his character drawing and this gives the dramatic artist his greatest chance of being original. In making plots it is far wiser to follow the rules that life-long experience has proved effective than to break through the formulas and attempt to do something that may, in the making, excite the dramatist's imagination, but that when made, is apt not to excite the spectator's. The formulas of dramatic construction are not conventional; they stand for facts. They are "schemes" that show how the human mind works. Characters change, but our primary human character never. Because characters change, the drama of every age changes in nearly every superficial aspect, and because characters change good drama, when it is written, must be up to date. Someone has said that if a dramatist fails to get a hearing from his own age, his works never will be thought worthwhile. This is because he can deal only with materials furnished to him by his own age; he can lay his hands on nothing else. He has to go out among men and feel with them the forces that make them what they are. They know nothing else but themselves and are also his audience. If the dramatist sets his play in the time of Timon of Athens, for instance, he must, none the less, picture his own time and the characters around him or he has mechanically to copy the people he finds in dramas of Timon's time. This bars out the use of his own originality and he cannot convince the imaginations of his audience.

Originality comes wholly from the imagination of the maker, and appeals to the imagination of the spectator. Everybody with a human mind has imagination. Genius is merely the faculty of using it so that others will see it and be stirred, and originality in a man's work is merely evidence that he has used it. The value of it is that it gives to us the pleasant feeling of our common humanity. We are all like branches on the same vine, the same sap, the same humanity runs through us all. Originality in a drama means that its maker has filled his characters with our common sap of life. They convince us that they are like ourselves. We look upon them as neighbors, we know them, they live in our community.

Motion picture making is the most difficult of the arts. It has the most complicated technique, it demands the most rigorous condensation and calls into play the widest knowledge of life and of human character. With so little space at his disposal in which to create an effect, the finest artistic sensibility is needed, for there is no room for things not useful in the final impression. All out-doors is a mighty good place to make a picture in, but to bring that all out-doors inside and put it on a screen needs an artist, and to bring a slice of true life on a screen needs a mind wise in many ways.

THE MANUFACTURER WORM TURNS!

It has been noteworthy how many metropolitan newspapers have suddenly changed their attitude on the motion picture of late. Financial reasons, due to the film industry's great growth, have been hinted at in many quarters. Newspaper editorial writers, it is said, have written favorable "leaders" on owners' orders. The owners, by the bye, would send an advertising representative around to the film manufacturers later. Oh! the things they say!

Well, Thanhouser seems to think that there is something to the talk of newspaper corruption, for it releases a newspaper exposure story Tuesday, April 15th. The picture is said to show the subservience of newspaper owners to politicians. "The Girl and the Grafter" is the title.

PICTURE MEN IN FLOODED DISTRICT.

ALMOST nothing in the way of detail has been reported regarding the losses of the owners of picture theaters in the regions devastated by tornado and flood. From the general reports on the extent of the damage caused by wind and water it is certain that many picture theaters throughout Indiana and Ohio have been totally destroyed. President Neff of the National Motion Picture Exhibitors' League, who has been keeping in touch with the situation, advises The Moving Picture World that he has been unable to get any detailed information up to this writing. Communication with the stricken cities has not been re-established and he has been unable to reach many members of the league by either mail, telephone or telegraph.

At Dayton, Mr. Neff says that all the picture houses were flooded to a depth of from eight to twenty feet; at Portsmouth, Ohio, eight picture theaters are under water; at Hamilton, Ohio, he is advised that the loss to the picture men is complete. Several houses in Cincinnati have been badly damaged and word from Indiana comes to the effect that there has been considerable loss sustained by the picture theater managers in that state.

Regarding the matter of rendering assistance to the members of the trade who have suffered loss, President Neff said that efforts were being made by the officers of the Indiana and Ohio leagues to help all members in good standing. It has been reported to him that there were more supplies on hand at Columbus and Dayton and other points than were needed to relieve the immediate needs of the several communities and that, as soon as the general situation was provided for the problem of individual necessities could be taken up. It will be some time before the extent of individual losses and individual needs can be ascertained, but when that time arrives the problem of restoring the picture theaters will be taken up by the league and will be handled in Indiana and Ohio by the organizations of those states.

"Such offers of assistance that have been referred to me," said President Neff, "I have advised that the funds raised be equally divided between Indiana and Ohio; part to be sent to Mr. F. J. Rembush at Shelbyville, Ind., and part to Mr. J. A. Maddox at Columbus, Ohio. I believe that this will be the best way to handle the matter at present

"When it comes to the matter of benefits for the flood sufferers I believe that the money raised from now on by the picture men should be set aside for the benefit of those in the trade who have suffered loss. As I said before, the various relief committees already have more supplies and money than they know what to do with, so it would be a waste of effort to turn any more money over to the general relief fund."

WILL TEST KANSAS CENSOR LAW.

The proposed censorship law for the state of Kansas, the text of which was published in the Moving Picture World several weeks ago, has been approved by the Governor and is supposed to be operative only, through some oversight the legislature adjourned without making any appropriation for carrying out its provisions. The Superintendent of Public Instruction, appointed by law to inspect films, gave the job a good try and then advertised for "competent public-spirited men and women" to take it off his hands. Applicants must be willing to wait a year for their pay as nothing can be done in the way of obtaining it until the legislature convenes again next year. The pay offered is $3 per day.

While the Superintendent of Public Instruction is trying to find someone to do the work an attempt will be made to have the courts pass on the legality of the act. New Nathanson, a Topeka, Kas., Exhibitor, backed by a number of exchange men, will undertake to make the test. He proposes to run pictures that have not been censored and, if arrested, the matter will be taken into the courts upon the constitutionality of the law.

The outcome of the matter will be awaited with interest.

BIG BENEFIT BY NEW YORK EXHIBITORS.

SATURDAY evening, April 12, is the date set for the monster benefit to be given by the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of Greater New York, for the relief of the Ohio flood sufferers. The affair will take place at the 69th Regiment Armony, 26th Street and Lexington Avenue (just behind Madison Square Garden), New York City.

The Committee of Arrangements has done some wonderfully rapid work in perfecting all the details of this big entertainment in the short space of one week. The armory itself could be procured only through permission of the Governor of New York. This was donated without charge by Governor Sulzer. William J. Gaynor, Mayor of New York, has consented to act as treasurer of the fund, and will probably be at the entertainment in person. A very strong program has been provided; it will consist of the very latest photoplays, which are to be donated by several of the New York exchanges. Then there will be photoplay stars loaned by the various manufacturing companies. Miss Alice Joyce of the Kalem Company will sell autographed photographs of herself among the audience. Among the picture players who will appear on the bill will be Mr. Tom Moore, Hugh Mack, Rogers Lytton, Alice Joyce, Crane Wilbur, Darwin Karr, Octavia Handworth, Marc MacDermott, Mary Fuller; also King Baggot and other important members of the Universal acting forces; Flora Finch, John Bunny, Florence Lawrence, Arthur Johnson, Florence Turner, Ormi Hawley, Mary Pickford, Owen Moore, Pearl White, Kenneth Casey, Adele DeGarde and others. If time will permit there will be several vaudeville acts in addition to the foregoing. The music will be rendered by the New York Letter Carriers Band without charge.

Donations are coming in remarkably fast and by the night of the entertainment these alone should amount to a very considerable sum. At the time of writing these donations are as follows: Kalem Co., $100; Vitagraph Co., $150; Pathe Freres, $150; Nicholas Power, $150; General Film Company, $150; Kinetograph Co., $100; Standard Machine Co., $75; Ad Kessel, $100; Hugo Reisinger, $50; Mutual Film Corp., $200; Universal Film Co., $150; Moving Picture World, $100; Thanhouser Co., $100; Wm. Fox, $100; Majestic Film Co., $100; Helen Gardner, $10; Moving Picture News, $50; Manhattan Slide Co., $25; Warner's Features, $50; Reliance Co., $50. In addition to the cash donations various services and supplies have been tendered as follows: advertising slides by Manhattan Slide & Film Co.; one thousand posters by Exhibitors Advertising & Specialty Co.; one thousand three-sheets by William E. Lee; Empire City Job Print; banners by Arthur Brady; armory by the State of New York; billboard space by the A. Van Beuren Co., indemnity bond by Maryland Casualty Company.

Within the next few days there will be many more donations to swell the general list. Tickets are now on sale at all theaters having membership in the Exhibitors League. The entertainment is being widely advertised on all of the screens in the city with special slides made for the purpose. The tickets are selling at fifty cents for general admission and one dollar for box seats.

BENEFITS REPORTED.

At a special meeting of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of the District of Columbia, held on Thursday, March 27th, the following resolution was adopted:

Whereas, The members of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of the District of Columbia have heard with profound regret of the terrible disaster visited upon certain cities and towns in the States of Ohio and Indiana;

Resolved, That the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of the District of Columbia expresses its deepest sympathy with the members of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' Leagues of Ohio and Indiana, and tenders its aid and assistance in their time of distress.

Resolved, further, that the secretary be directed to convey these expressions to the President of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America.

Although the membership of our League is limited to the city of Washington, within a very few minutes a thousand dollars was subscribed and our treasurer has recently turned over to the Red Cross Society over eleven hundred dollars. Boxes soliciting contributions for the flood sufferers were placed in the lobbies of the theaters with excellent results and their contents will be forwarded next week.

Vice-President Marshall and several members of Mr. Wilson's cabinet attended a performance at the theater of one of our members to witness the flood pictures. The President was expected, but telephoned his inability to be present.

On April 2nd a benefit was held at the Garfield Theater, 181st Street and Broadway, New York, the receipts of which were sent to the Mayor's committee. On this occasion Miss Marian Nesbitt, Mr. Marc MacDermott, Mr. Charles Seay and Yale Boss, all of the Edison players, appeared. The photoplayers were enthusiastically received and their presence aided materially in swelling the receipts of the day.

ESSEX COUNTY EXHIBITORS LEAGUE BENEFIT.

Something more than $1,000 has been contributed by the members of the Essex County Exhibitors' League, Essex County, N. J., to the fund for the relief of the flood sufferers. This sum was realized by the donation of the receipts of the theaters operated by the Essex exhibitors received at last Sunday's entertainments.

PRESIDENT TRIGGER'S UP-STATE TRIP.

On Wednesday, April 2, President Samuel H. Trigger of the New York State and Local Exhibitors' Leagues started on another missionary tour of the state, in company with Secretary Harold W. Rosenthal. He went first to Syracuse to be present at the banquet and ball of the Syracuse local. On the same train with them were Darwin Karr of the Solax Company, Miss Pearl White of the Crystal M. P. Company and Hugh Mack of the Vitagraph Company, all three photoplayers, bound for the same place as guests of the Syracuse exhibitors at their ball. The visiting party was met at the depot by President A. N. Wolf; J. E. Thompson; W. C. Hubbard, vice-president; C. L. Tyler and W J. Malarkey. The ball was a grand success, socially and financially. A number of prominent city officials were among the guests. The photoplayers proved to be a great drawing card and they enjoyed themselves immensely.

President Trigger is very enthusiastic about the Syracuse local. He says that it is the best local in the state. There are forty exhibitors in the town and there are forty members in the local. That is what we might call a 100 per cent. exhibitors league, and it is surely a wide-awake up-to-date organization. The great pity is that there are not more like it.

Oswego Organized.

At the special request of J. R. Schilling, owner of the Eureka Theater, Oswego, N. Y., who was present at the Syracuse exhibitors' ball, Messrs. Trigger and Rosenthal went from Syracuse to Oswego and there organized the Oswego local on the following day. The following were elected as temporary officers; President, J. E. Cordingly, Bridge Theater; Vice-President, Chas. A. Donnelly, Star Theater; Treasurer, P. C. Gilmore, Hippodrome; Secretary, P. G. Campbell, Crescent Theater. After the meeting the visitors were tendered a banquet by the Oswego exhibitors.

State Committee Meeting at Buffalo.

On April 4, Messrs. Trigger and Rosenthal arrived in Binghamton to complete the organization of the local there. The meeting had been arranged by President H. L. Fox and R. M. Davidson, 2nd state vice-president. When the visitors left, all of the Binghamton exhibitors (15) had joined the local. From Binghamton they went to Buffalo to attend the State Committee quarterly meeting. The delegates met at the Statler Hotel where a well laid out banquet was the first thing to be disposed of. This had been arranged by members of the Buffalo local. At the session the question of censorship took prominence over other matters was thoroughly thrashed out. The conclusion of the deliberations was to the effect that all pictures should be censored by an authorized national board and that pictures not censored by that board should not be exhibited.

Mr. Trigger reports that the up-state members generally, and the committeemen he met at Buffalo are all agog over the big exposition of the motion picture industry to be held in New York City, July 7 to 12. Most of the exhibitors he spoke with on the subject stated their intentions of attending the exposition and in the meantime to advertise it as extensively as possible on their theater screens and otherwise. Now that President Trigger has become quite well acquainted with the New York State league members, his hard preliminary work will begin to show results. Having met him a number of times, the up-state exhibitors are beginning to recognize the fact that they have for a State president a man who will go to any length and any pains legitimately to further the cause of the motion picture exhibitors. They are commencing to realize that his heart is in the work, and that he is the right man in the right place.

NEW YORK EXHIBITORS FAVOR LIMITED SERVICE.

At the last meeting of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of Greater New York held April 9, at the Union Square Hotel the principal topics of discussion were the coming joint benefit of the League members for the relief of the Ohio flood sufferers, and the question of regulating the number of reels to be exhibited at different prices of admission. The benefit matters are treated of elsewhere. The question came up for the first time seriously for the establishment of a limit to the number of reels that should be shown for a five cent admission, a ten cent admission, and other admissions upward. The number of reels to be shown for a certain admission price has been satisfactorily adjusted among the exhibitors themselves in other cities, notably Chicago and San Francisco. The majority of members present were in favor of some such procedure and as a result of the discussion a committee was appointed to canvass the Borough of the Bronx to get the sentiments of all exhibitors in that locality on the question. Separate committees will be appointed for the other boroughs in turn, until all counties are heard from, after which a main committee composed of the chairmen of the several borough committees will confer with the General Film Company and the various independent exchanges for co-operation in enforcing the limited service plan. Frank L. Dyer, president of the General Film Company, was present at the meeting and he promised the support of his organization in the matter as far as it is legally possible for them to do so. Mr. Dyer also made an address to the members, outlining the general policy of the General Film Company toward exhibitors. He denied emphatically any statement to the effect that the General Film Company is contemplating entering the exhibition branch of the business, and he assured the members that during his tensure of office all exhibitors will be treated by that organization with the utmost courtesy. I. Van Runkel, manager of the Fourth Avenue branch of the General Film Company, also addressed the members of the League and endorsed the sentiments expressed by Mr. Dyer.

The Bronx Committee on limited film service is composed of the following members: Chairman, A. Cohen; Alfred Coleman, Wm. Allen, A. Bauernfreund, Samuel Golfarb. These gentlemen will visit all the Bronx theaters in the very near future.

MISSISSIPPI EXHIBITORS' CONVENTION.

On March 28, 1913, the exhibitors of Mississippi assembled in the Convention Hall of the Great Southern Hotel, at Gulfport, and formally organized the Mississippi State Branch of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America. President M. A. Neff was in attendance at this meeting and fully explained to those present the various benefits and advantages to be derived from being affiliated with the league. Several matters of importance pertaining to the future welfare of the league were thoroughly discussed. A telegram was sent to Governor Brewer asking permission for all moving picture shows in the State to remain open Sunday, April 9th and give the receipts for the day to the Ohio storm sufferers. In reply Governor Brewer telegraphed to State Vice-President Fred Abbley as follows:

"I have no authority to grant you privilege to show on Sunday for benefit storm sufferers. Will have to see local authorities, who will doubtless aid you in your charitable work." (Signed) Earl Brewer.

Various members of the league, therefore, as advised in the telegram are asking permission from local authorities, with what success has not yet been learned.

The officers elected at the Gulfport meeting are as follows: Mr. Fred Abbley, Gulfport, re-elected vice-president National League; H. A. Carleton, Jackson, president; B. A. Mulligan, Vicksburg, first vice-president; C. H. Howell, Okolona, second vice-president; R. H. Redus, West Point, secretary; G. W. Wilkes, Biloxi, treasurer; S. L. Taylor, Pass Christian, sergeant-at-arms.

The meeting adjourned to meet on May 8, 1913, at Jackson, Miss., at which time delegates to the National meeting in New York will be elected. It is urged that every member of the league in the State and all other moving picture exhibitors in the State attend this very important meeting.

LOUISIANA EXHIBITORS ORGANIZE.

A permanent organization of motion picture exhibitors of Louisiana was effected on Thursday, March 27, when a representative number of the exhibitors of that State gathered at the Gruenwald Hotel, New Orleans. Officers of the new branch were elected as follows: John Depinet, national vice-president, New Orleans; A. G. Gugel, president, Gretna; A. G. Shear, first vice-president, New Orleans; H. C. Van Cott, second vice-president, Alexandria; F. H. Maybury, secretary, New Orleans; Sidney Levy, treasurer, New Orleans; J. W. Russ, New Orleans, sergeant-at-arms. Delegates were elected to the third national convention of the M. P. E. L. of A., which is to be held in New York City, as follows: Abraham Seligman, W. H. Gueringer, Theo. Recknagel, Albert Durning, Solomon Loeb, W. L. Jennings. Alternates: F. R. Feiderich, Jr., A. W. Waisdorf, H. Freidenberg, V. C. Howard, S. L. Bourke, M. B. Gill. One of the first acts of the New Orleans exhibitors after joining the league was to raise ninety-seven dollars to be sent to the flood sufferers of Ohio and Indiana.

TO TENNESSEE EXHIBITORS.

A meeting of the Tennessee Branch of the M. P. E. L. of A. has been called for Nashville, Tenn., in the parlors of the Tulane Hotel, Wednesday, April 16th. This is in place of the meeting some days since which was postponed on account of the indisposition of the Secretary, and other reasons. State President Wassermann and State Secretary Morris will be in charge of the meeting and an invitation is extended to every exhibitor in the State to be present and assist in making this meeting an important factor in our association.

We feel that with the opening of spring that business conditions will improve, and now is the time for us to wake up and get in line with our sister states, of which some of them are making great advancement, and strides in the matter of organization.

Tennessee has many live exhibitors who should take advantage of this opportunity to join the League, and we are going to make a special effort to interest them and show them the advantages to be derived from thorough organization.

We had the pleasure of meeting with the National Convention in Chicago last summer, and believe that if all the exhibitors in the state had been there, and been able to see what was to be learned, what was to be gained through organization, what storms were to be encountered without organization, listened to the great truths expounded by able speakers, partaken of the many pleasures provided by the entertainment committee, there would not be a man who would not today be a member.

The Convention (National), called for July in New York, is only a few short months away, this will be the greatest of them all, we will all want to go, special arrangements will be made for transportation, and it will be a week of one continuous round of pleasure.

Brothers, now is the time to meet with us and get in line. The expense is nothing compared to the advantages to be derived, and we want you one and all. There will be things come before this State Convention that will be of interest to every exhibitor in the state, try and meet with us, and become one of us.

We extend a special invitation to Memphis Exhibitors, Memphis the city of Conventions, we want representation in that great city, and possibly to hold the next state convention with them. We also want to see the smiling faces of Brothers Rogers of Knoxville and Graham of Chattanooga at Nashville on the 16th of April. Trusting that we may have a large number of exhibitors with us, and assuring that there will be ample entertainment for all, we are,

Most respectfully,
W. C. Morris
Secretary State Branch, M. P. E. L. of America.

MASSACHUSETTS HEADQUARTERS OPENING.

On Tuesday April 1, the Massachusetts League opened its Boston headquarters at 25-29 LaSalle Street, Boston. There was an extensive program of vaudeville and pictures and fully 250 persons visited the rooms during the evening, many staying to the finish. An elaborate luncheon was served.

CONVENTION DATES CHANGED.

Notice is given by Secretary Fred Young, of the Iowa Exhibitors' League, that the convention formerly announced to be held at the Savery Hotel, Des Moines, Iowa, on May 6 and 7, will be held at the Auditorium, Des Moines, on May 13 and 14. Extensive preparations are being made for this convention and a large attendance is assured. Exhibitors and manufacturers should address Secretary Young for particulars.

President L. R. Thomas, of the West Virginia Exhibitors' League, announces that the dates for the West Virginia convention have been changed from April 15 and 16 to April 29 and 30. The change was made necessary by the recent high water which has interrupted railway communication to such an extent that it will be impossible for exhibitors to reach Wheeling on the earlier dates. A big attendance of exhibitors is expected at this meeting. President Neff will be there.

ARGUMENTS ON THE "TIME" QUESTION.

Another stage in the fight being made by the Massachusetts League to have the law regulating the time that motion pictures may be shown continuously extended from twenty minutes to one hour, was reached on Wednesday, April 2, when a hearing was held by the Committee on Legal Affairs in the hands of which the matter now is. The bill to extend the time to one hour was introduced in the Massachusetts legislature at the instance of the League. It was opposed at the recent hearing by Corporation Counsel J. J. Corbett of Boston who produced letters from a number of occulists to the effect that the extension of time was detrimental to the eyes and health of children, especially.

Senator Bagley submitted in favor of the bill letters from a number of equally famous occulists giving it as their opinions that the extension would not affect the eyes detrimentally.

It is believed that the "Hour Bill" will be passed despite opposition.

EXHIBITORS EXPOSITION NOTES.

F. E. Samuels returns from the London Exposition on Sunday. Letters from him announce that the London show was a big success. Many film men from the English metropolis will exhibit at the New York show.

M. A. Neff, who has just returned from a trip through the South, reports a great deal of enthusiasm among exhibitors. A number have already arranged to come north for the Fourth of July as well as to attend the exposition in New York.

Samuel H. Trigger returned on Tuesday morning from a trip through New York. He tells of enthusiasm there also. It would seem that every exhibitor Mr. Trigger saw has already made arrangements to be in New York on July 7.

Nicholas Power Company, while planning for its exhibit, found that four spaces were not enough, so through its general sales manager, L. W. Atwater, four more spaces were contracted for, giving the Nicholas Power Company from Nos. 341 to 348 inclusive.

Theater No. 1 on the mezzanine floor has been taken by the Mutual Film Corporation. The Mutual is planning for a big time, and will show nothing but pre-released films during the week.

Bausch & Lomb of Rochester, N. Y., has taken a prominent location on the main floor to exhibit its goods.

A. G. Whyte of the Whyte-Whitman Company sent word to his firm from the London Exposition to arrange for space in the Exhibitors Exposition at the New Grand Central Palace. This has been done by the New York manager of the Whyte-Whitman Company. The firm's cameras will surely be there.

M. A. Singer, a well-known decorator, has taken Spaces 13 and 14, directly over the main entrance. While in the office of the Exposition Committee on Tuesday, Mr. Singer displayed plans of the handsome bungalow he will erect. It looks good on paper.

L. W. Woodward, general manager of the Enterprise Optical Company, while in New York expressed himself as being greatly pleased at the rapid strides being made by the committee. "It seems hardly possible that so much space has been rented so long before the show," said Mr. Woodward when shown that only one-third of the space remains unrented.

Menger & Ring will exhibit new ideas in lobby display.

The Wagner Electric Manufacturing Company, will display some unique electrical effects.

"The Grey Sentinel"

Two-Reel Broncho Release.

Reviewed by Louis Reeves Harrison.

THIS is a coast story—a decided relief—and the Grey Sentinel is a Virginia lighthouse, but the scenes are those of the Civil War, and the movement is of tremendous, almost bewildering, energy. I think it was Aristotle who stated that action is the essential element in drama, and it is certainly of high value on the screen, but "The Grey Sentinel" is almost overcrowded with it. Boats launched in the breakers; marine pictures of a surf-beaten shore; fierce engagements in the foreground; more than one far stretch of battle, with hundreds of troops in deadly conflict; cavalry dashes; artillery duels; infantry manoeuvres; desperate falls; it is fighting, fighting, fighting, in trenches, behind barricades, within houses, and even on the sea.

Fully fifty scenes to the reel are necessary to depict all this movement, and no character in them is at rest for the fraction of a second, but for all that may be said in favor of action and this marvelous exponent of action, I prefer the two other plays of Burton King's direction that I have reviewed. A play may go over without character enforcement—doing things is drama, and the plot is the fundamental element by tradition and logic—but the career of a hero or heroine becomes far more interesting when our admiration or sympathy is engaged.

Scene from "The Grey Sentinel" (Broncho).

People enjoy such splendid ensembles as are shown in "The Grey Sentinel," but they can only be incidental to the story, and, so far as screen pictures are concerned, we have a habit of watching the adventures and progress of a single person—some one to whom our interest has been attached. It is almost impossible to catch and hold attention to one individual where so many are engaged in swift determination of events, and where there is not time to develop this or that dominant character. The play largely involves the adventures of a young officer, and the scenes of strife afford opportunity for vehement self-expression, but the mind of the spectator is continually distracted by vivid pictures of action so general that it is difficult at times to single out the central figure.

A vast amount of work is involved in producing a play of this kind; the director is largely a conqueror of hampering conditions, and on this very account I would like to see the massed action utilized as a powerful accessory to the development of a character whose fate would quicken suspense by deeply stirring our sympathies, or used to make a lasting and valuable impression. If, in illustration, a play should be undertaken—let us call it "Non-combatants," for the lack of a better title—which would admit of the spirited scenes exhibited in this one and show the effect of war on those who play no part in it, ruining their homes and means of subsistence, there would be a purpose to be felt, a lasting impression to take away.

I instinctively favor a screen story involving one central figure and a single line of action because of time limitations, so much being compressed into a comparatively small space, but a sweeping glance at the most successful stage plays and printed stories favors the same view. "The Grey Sentinel" presents adequate types, admirably selected scenes, and its artistic and dramatic end is beyond criticism. It also deserves praise for going to life instead of the theater for its theme.

MR. COLIN GOODMAN FROM LONDON.

Another of our English cousins in the film trade is in our midst on his first visit. Mr. Goodman has traveled in the states before, but inasmuch as he was not in the film business then, that trip doesn't count. Mr. Goodman, whose likeness appears forninst, is a member of the firm of Ruffells Imperial Bioscope Syndicate Limited; limited as to shares but not in the monaker. The Ruffells Syndicate lays claim to being the oldest established film rental agency in London, and at the present time enjoys a clientele of 150 theaters using its service. Lately the company has been doing some branching out by buying the exclusive rights for Great Britain for various makes of foreign films, and exploiting them. That is why Mr. Goodman is in America at this time. Since his arrival he has been busy securing the British agencies of a number of well known American makes of films. In his first three days in New York he accomplished more in a business way than he expected to do in a couple of weeks. He gravitated instinctively to the fountain-head of the film trade, where we found him mingling with men of large affairs. Within a couple of days Mr. Goodman had closed with the Ramo and the Ryno companies for their entire output. He was also dickering for some other good stuff. For one certain feature he offered $18,000. He has a big transaction under cover which he says will be a big surprise both to the English and American branches of the trade, when the time is ripe to spring it.

Mr. Colin Goodman.

A MODEL THEATER.

How It Was Opened at Hasbrouck Heights, N. J.

Most elaborate and interesting ceremonies attended the opening of a new motion picture theater in the little Jersey town of Hasbrouck Heights. The speech of dedication was made by the Mayor, who spoke of the value of the motion picture as an educational influence. He confessed he had been prejudiced against motion pictures by what he saw in the way of posters before certain houses in the city, but Mr. Denton, the owner of the new theater, had convinced him that the pictures were far better than the posters. Some of the councilmen, members of the Board of Education and likewise the principal clergymen of the Borough were in attendance. There was nothing but praise for the exhibitor and for the pictures. W. Stephen Bush of The Moving Picture World had been invited to attend and speak, and gave a brief talk on the progress of the motion picture and on its great future. He was listened to with great interest and heartily applauded.

The new theater is built on the most progressive lines and holds about 300 people. Everything has been done for the safety of the patrons and particularly for the comfort of ladies and children. The booth answers the most minute regulations of the Jersey law and is in charge of a capable operator. Mr. Denton has placed his theater at the disposal of any church or social organization at any time, when he is not actually using it for the showing of his pictures.

PRESIDENT NEFF IN NEW YORK.

Summoned to attend a hearing in the government suit against the Motion Picture Patents Co. and others, President M. A. Neff of the National Exhibitors League spent several days in New York last week. Among other things he made a call at the office of the Moving Picture World. Mr. Neff started on his return trip Wednesday, calling at Philadelphia, Washington, Pittsburgh and other points on the way to Cincinnati.

CHICAGO LETTER

By JAS. S. McQUADE

THE meetings held in New York, beginning March 27, by the Universal Film Manufacturing Co., and members of the Independent Exchange Co., occupied nearly two weeks. The meetings were not continuous, as the exchange men left for their homes near the close of the first week and returned to New York to renew discussions.

During the first week a contract drawn up by the board of directors of the Universal was submitted to a committee representing the Independent Exchange Co. Frank T. Bailey, vice-president of the latter company, was chairman of the committee. During the discussion over the form of contract that would be acceptable to the exchange men, Messrs. Carrick and Bennethum, of the Interstate Films Co., were present. The terms of the Universal contract, which provided for the leasing of films and the purchase of exchanges, were rejected unanimously.

The committee then drew up a counter proposition which was submitted to the board of directors of the Universal. This was on Monday, March 31. The principal clauses of this proposition embodied that the members of the Independent Exchange Co., were willing to buy a maximum of 12 reels weekly from the Universal, said reels to measure up to the requisite quality; also that all additional films required to fill out their programs should be selected from the best Independent makes in the market. All films, including those of the Universal, were to be subjected to screen examination. The proposition also conveyed the assurance that the exchange men were willing to pay up to two cents per foot, additional, for quality.

Furthermore, instead of leasing films from the Universal, it was proposed by the committee to pay the price agreed upon for any reel of film purchased, and to return to the Universal one old reel of film for every new reel purchased, thus gradually retiring the old stock on hand and protecting the market from being flooded with junk. It is expected that the board of directors of the Universal will make reply to the proposition sometime within the week ending April 12.

There was no inclination on the part of any exchange men present to sell their exchanges, except at their own option and price. The members of the Independent Exchange Co., stand absolutely for the purchase of films on a quality basis, the standard of quality to be fixed by an unbiased committee, comprised, if necessary, of manufacturers, exchange men and exhibitors.

As the alignment of exchanges, using the Universal program, is at present drawn, there are eight exchanges with the Universal—the four Laemmle exchanges, Swanson's two and the two Universal exchanges in New York City. The six exchanges of the Interstate Films Co.—three in Philadelphia, one in Wilkesbarre, one in Baltimore and one in Washington—are neutral. As has been already stated, Messrs. Carrick and Bennethum of the Interstate company were present during the deliberations of the committee appointed to pass on the contract submitted by the Universal. All other exchanges in the United States and Canada, using the Universal program, are with the Independent Exchange Co.

In St. Louis, the office is in dispute, as the Morgan exchange, formerly known as the Universal Film Exchange, with Mr. Cotter as manager, was forcibly seized by the Universal about two or three weeks ago. Mr. Morgan has his exchange at present across the hall in the same building, and he is with the Independent Exchange Co. In the meantime, the ownership of the Universal Film Exchange is being determined by legal proceedings.

The outlook for an amicable settlement of the points at issue between the Universal Film Manufacturing Co., and the Independent Exchange Co., is far from favorable. A break is imminent.

The Coming of Arthur Leslie.

Who is Arthur Leslie? He is going to reform the entire film business! He has evolved the bright(?) idea of furnishing 60 newspapers, weekly, with "roasts" on films, which have appeared in trade papers. Mr. Leslie sincerely thinks that these "roasts," printed from coast to coast will exert a good influence. He wants to impress film manufacturers that "a new spirit is abroad in filmland."

No, this is not a new spirit. It is the spirit of destructiveness that existed during the stone age, and which has been perpetuated through certain unfortunate members of the race ever since. The scandalmonger never sees the good points in a man's or woman's character; always the weak ones.

What about publishing some of the many good things printed about films in the trade papers, Mr. Leslie? These reviews will crowd the "roasts" off your intermeddling sheet. And why are you so biased in the selection of your roasts?

New Grand Central, St. Louis, Opened.

The New Grand Central, St. Louis, owned by the Grand Central Amusement Co., of which Wm. Sievers is manager, was opened March 31 under most favorable auspices. This magnificent theater, with its beautiful architecture and fine appointments, is a credit to the moving picture industry. Later on, in the proper columns, a description of the house, with illustration, will appear in this paper. The St. Louis Times, of April 1, describes the opening as follows:

"With a deafening rattle and bang, deftly produced back stage, the new Grand Central Theater, Grand and Lucas avenues, staged its feature reel, 'Pauline Cushman, Federal Spy,' in a manner last night that fulfilled the promise of the new house to present moving pictures realistically.

"Troops of cavalry charged across the screen, field guns boomed, and volleys rattled with astonishing faithfulness, while the beautiful Pauline frustrated the attempt to ambush Gen. Rosecrans and effectively routed Gen. Bragg. The film is in two reels and emphasized the beauty and accuracy which photography in its most advanced form can retell history or fiction. 'Babes in the Woods' was also shown, and made a deep impression with its compelling pathos.

"Patrons found in the New Grand Central a playhouse of uncommon attractiveness and artistic decorations. The auditorium is roomy, the seats spacious and comfortable, and the policy of showing moving pictures only, accompanied by incidental music, that comes from the great organ at the right of the stage, one that appeals to a large class of amusement seekers who do not care for vaudeville.

"Beginning this afternoon, the New Grand Central will have a matinee daily, with two shows nightly, all at popular prices (10c). Next Saturday matinee, the St. Louis Times will send 500 winners in the 'Mike and Ike' contest to the New Grand Central, where the youngsters will see 'Babes in the Woods' and other pictures."

Get-Rich-Quick Exhibitors.

"Up in Santa Rosa, California, moving picture theater owners some time ago conceived the idea of boosting their business by advertising they would give away lots to patrons of their nickelodeons who happened to hold a winning number," says the Sacramento Union. "This was an alluring bit of advertising, and business trebled within a short time. It was apparent from the start that the theaters were doing it up proper, for many there were who drew a winning number. The lucky person had only to deposit a filing fee to get a deed.

"Many deeds were filed. In fact, so many that the Sonoma county recorder's office was swamped. Assemblyman Slater was appealed to. He was told the lots were absolutely worthless, and that the moving picture men were getting a corner on all the money in the county. Accordingly he introduced a bill in the lower house the first part of the session making it a misdemeanor for any person to give away worthless lots and collect a fee for transferring or conveying them to the owners of persons drawing lucky numbers.

"The assembly heard Salter's explanation to conditions, and railroaded the bill through without delay."

Educational Films From the Philippines.

Dr. Edward Burton McDowell, the Chicago camera expert, traveler and lecturer has again been heard from, in the Philippines, just before leaving for India. His letter, in part, is here given.

"When I tell the story in the United States of how I slept in tropical Manila under a single sheet, and the next night in Baguio under heavy blankets, it will surely surprise the people at home. The air reminded me of ideal October weather in northern United States, and with a temperature at night of 58 degrees, the grate fire at the Pines Hotel feels comfortable.

"I spent a most enjoyable week in Baguio and vicinity. I had two objects in view, first to see the famous summer capital, and secondly, to see the Igorots. I shall never forget the kindness of Governor Elmer A. Eckman. He is a very busy man; for, in addition to being governor of the Province of Benguet and mayor of Baguio, he also is in charge of the new railroad which is being constructed. We spent three hot days planning and framing up Igorot trips. The first film made was of the Igorots building the railroad, one of the most interesting I have ever done. It will show hundreds of men, innocent of clothing except the conventional G string making the dirt fly on the side of a cut, and hauling it away in wheelbarrows.

"The following day the governor sent some of his men to a place named Pico, an Igorot village. These men took with them a good sized live pig, a quantity of rice, and several gallons of rice wine. The next day we arrived in the cool of the morning, but everything was boiling in the barrio and the festivities were on. While the dance was going on in front of my moving picture camera, the live pig was brought in, his heart pierced, the animal placed on the fire to burn off the hair, dressed, cut up in chunks, boiled in a large kettle, and in the short space of twenty minutes chow was announced.

"I then turned the cinematograph camera on the feast, a jolly bunch seated on the ground eating boiled rice and pig with their fingers, and drinking rice wine. Also some of the customs of the people were motion pictured, showing preparations of rice for hulling, and some studies of the women and men, one showing the operation of a mother strapping her child on her back also taking her baby to a mountain stream for a bath, the child screaming lustily.

"Next day, Sunday, Governor Eckman took me to the dog market at Baguio. If a man is looking for novelty, that dog market is worth a trip from the United States to see. Hundreds of lean, lanky tikes and curs were lined up and passed in review in front of the moving film. From there the governor took me to the labor camp, where he had a bunch of Bontocs, another tribe, and we took pictures of their dance, a very picturesque one with their long hair, more wild and animated. I picked out one fine looking, athletic fellow, gave him a handful of spears and a shield, placed him with a background of rocks. Here he did a wild, war dance as he threw the spears, with most serious ferocious mien, while the film recorded his antics.

"I made about 2000 feet of those Igorots. To me, they are more interesting than the Moros, being better developed physically and more picturesque."

Dr. Edward McDowell's pictures have all been contracted for by Wm. N. Selig, and are of high educational value and interest for Americans.

Chicago Film Brevities.

J. W. Dillon, owner of the Exhibit Theater, Danville, Ill., called at the World office last week. His visit to the city was for the purpose of getting plans from the Decorators Supply Co., for the remodeling of his theater front. Mr. Dillon is also enlarging the exhibit, which, when completed, will seat about 350 people. Mr. Dillon gives straight picture programs and charges 5 cents admission.

The Amusement Supply Co., now located at 107 N. Dearborn St., will move into new offices and display rooms at 160 N. Fifth Ave., on or about April 11. Mr. Traub, general manager of the company, desires to inform all purchasers of moving picture machines and supplies, that they can see on display at his quarters all the principal makes of machines on the market. The new quarters afford more room and a finer display than the old quarters permitted.

A. L. Alberti has completed his fine new theater, the Alvin, at 1612-14 W. Chicago Ave., and will open up shortly. The house has a seating capacity of 500 and cost $40,000. The operating room is equipped with the latest machines and appliances. Those include two Power's 6-A machines, with Gundlach-Manhattan lenses, spotlight, Motiograph dissolver, Wagner converter, etc., all furnished by the Kleine Optical Co., this city. License service will be used, and admission will be 10 cents.

Phil H. Solomon, Chicago manager of the Warner's Feature Film Co., states that he will move into larger quarters on May 1, owing to the largely increased volume of business handled here. He has added suite 304, at 167 W. Washington St., to his old quarters, and predicts that, owing to the popularity of his productions, it won't be long before the new quarters will be insufficient to meet the requirements. Mr. Solomon made a trip to Minneapolis recently and reported flourishing conditions there. He left for Milwaukee, April 8, to attend the convention of Wisconsin State Branch No. 8, Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America, on Tuesday and Wednesday, April 8 and 9.

WHAT THE DIRECTOR IS UP AGAINST.

Charles M. Seay, the Edison director, tells of a few incidents which emphasize the difficulties under which pictures are occasionally made. He was recently preparing a scene in which William Bechtel was to fall into a ditch full of water. In order to get the most effective view, he placed a few boards across the ditch and had the camera located on them. But when Bechtel made his fall the director got excited and Bechtel, Seay, cameraman and camera all arrived in the ditch together.

This one sounds almost too good to be true but we have the director's word for it—he was making a picture which was built around the jealousy between two old country store-keepers whose establishments were next door to each other. The problem was to find two adjoining stores which would give the proper atmosphere. After a long hunt extending over miles of country around the studio, he finally discovered just the sort of place he was looking for. After making arrangements with the proprietor of one store he asked him whether he would complete the arrangements with his next door neighbor or whether he wanted Seay to interview him. The old fellow bristled perceptibly and said, "If you want to have dealings with him you can't do business with me. I haven't spoken to him for twelve years!"

It was only after a long hard struggle that the director succeded in getting the proprietors to consent to having their two stores appear in the same picture—both wanted to be the whole show and each was afraid that he would have to talk to the other. But patience and diplomacy won out though the old fellows did not speak.

A few days ago Mr. Seay conceived the idea of taking a picture in the subway and, taking his cameraman with him, he went over to one of the uptown stations to see if the idea could be worked out. Their machine stopped directly at the head of the stairs and the two men went down into the station and stood over at one side surveying the place carefully and discussing in low tones the possibilities of various spots. It was late in the morning and travel was light. There were only two or three women on the platform and the ticket seller was out of his booth talking to the ticket chopper.

The engine of Mr. Seay's car could be heard buzzing at the top of the stairs. The ticket seller glanced casually at the two men, then he looked a little harder. The noise of the motor reached him and his face gradually stiffened into a do-or-die expression. Then, with an air of the greatest possible unconcern, he sauntered over to his booth securely locked the door and began to put all his change away into a drawer. They were taxi bandits!

It is a common occurrence to have people "butt in" while a picture is being made and probably every director has lost all chance of ever getting to heaven by reason of his remarks upon these occasions. Julian Reed, made up as a grouch, was badly abusing Edna Hamel, who was weeping copiously. A square jawed woman—probably just back from the suffragette parade at Washington—took one look at the performance and sailing majestically across the street she proceeded to give that "brutal ruffian" the tongue lashing of his life. When the horrible truth finally was explained to her, she left boiling with indignation apparently believing that the whole affair was a deliberate attempt to deceive her.

William Wadsworth, on another occasion was to attempt to board a train with a dog and a suit case. He was to get the suit case on the platform of the car and then the conductor was to stop him and the train was to pull out during the ensuing argument, taking Wadsworth's suit case with it. But a kind and thoughtful fellow passenger "spilled the beans" by hastily throwing the suit case to the horrified Wadsworth.

* * *

A diminutive kitten held up one of Walter Edwin's pictures not long ago and caused one of the best impromptu comedies that has ever been seen. The reel could not be finished without the kitten which was very carefully guarded during the preparation of a new scenic setting. But she finally escaped and then began the ridiculous spectacle of three perfectly serious six-footers—Herbert Prior, Charles Ogle and Walter Edwin—chasing a speck of a kitten, dodging in and out of scenes, crawling over stage properties and making wild rushes in the open until finally the fugitive was surrounded and captured by a carefully planned flank movement.

Doings at Los Angeles

Mace a Candidate for Mayor—Trying to End Exchange War —Mexican Picture Protested—News Notes.

FRED MACE, formerly leading man in the Biograph comedies and more recently with the Keystone company, is one of the three candidates for mayor of Los Angeles in the municipal campaign which is now in progress. Politicians dope it out that he hasn't a ghost of a show to win. but Mace doesn't care so much about that as he does about making an exciting campaign. The motion picture forces of the city seem to be backing him to a man and a number of the exhibitors have volunteered to assist him by showing stereopticon slides on the screen or by donating the use of their houses for campaign meetings. Members of The Photoplayers organization, of which Mace is president, took charge of the work of circulating the petitions upon which he was nominated. The primary election is to be held May 6 and at that time the two candidates who receive the highest and the next highest vote respectively will be declared the regular candidates for the office. Subsequently they will fight it out between themselves in the final campaign which closes the first week of June. The chief issue this Spring is Socialism and the socialist candidate for mayor finds himself opposed by a fusion candidate who has been endorsed by all the political parties and factions outside the Socialist organization. When a reporter asked Mace his politics he replied that he is a motion picture actor. The political writers say that the addition of Mace to the field will add spice to the campaign. It is also too late to copyright the observation that he bears a name which stands for high authority. By way of adding zest to the campaign he is having a one reel picture made which will show in a humorous way what he proposes to do when he takes office. Dissolving scenes will picture the transformations he will bring about.

While engaged in running for mayor he has not been too busy to look after his private affairs. A week ago he resigned from the Keystone company and this week it was announced that he has obtained an interest in the Balboa Motion Picture Co., which will begin at once to issue a special series of comedy films. They will be directed by Mace and he will appear in all of them. The expectation is that they will be marketed through the same channels as the Famous Players pictures. The company has obtained a tract of land adjoining the Revier Laboratories at Vine and Selma streets in Hollywood and will erect a stage and necessary buildings within two weeks.

The Revier Laboratories, by the way, are becoming a great institution. Under the management of Harry Revier, president of the company, the plant has been enlarged until at the present time the buildings occupy nearly three acres of ground space and the plant is equipped with dark rooms, printing machines and drying rooms having a capacity to turn out nearly 10,000 feet of film a day. Within the last month there have been several occasions when the rush of business made it necessary to work all night.

Fred Mace is not the only representative of the motion picture industry who is trying to elbow into politics. A. P. Tugwell, manager of the Rose theater on Spring street, is one of a long list of candidates for city council. There are nine places to be filled and the indications are that before the lists close there will be fifty or sixty candidates. Although Tugwell has in the past declared himself to be a Socialist he did not receive the endorsement of the Socialist convention and consequently will be independent of any political party.

Los Angeles Liberal with Flood Victims.

Motion pictures of the floods and cyclones in various parts of the East reached this city before the news stories had disappeared from the front pages of the newspaper and for once the motion picture theaters were able to compete with the dailies in real live news of timely interest. So many companies had photographers on the scenes of the disasters at an early hour that there were more flood and cyclone pictures available than the theaters could conveniently use. Nearly every theater in town found opportunity to use film dealing with this subject.

In Los Angeles as in every other community in the United States the misfortunes of the people of the stricken communities aroused quick sympathy which took practical form. From every direction funds poured in for relief. The motion picture people more than did their share. Many of the theaters donated their receipts to the relief fund. The Mozart theater gave a special benefit performance at which Fred Mace, Mabel Normand of the Keystone company, and Gus Pixley of the Biography appeared. All of the officers of the local branch of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League served on a committee to raise funds. The Universal company offered its entire plant resources to the committee to be used in giving a huge out of door entertainment the proceeds from which are to be devoted to relief work. Included in its tender was an offer to film the show and the crowds and devote the proceeds of the pictures to the fund.

Seeking to End Exchange War.

There has been a rumor in circulation here this week, which several of the exhibitors declare they believe to be true, that all or a majority of the independent film exchanges have practically consolidated their interests, and that the ruthless competition which has prevailed for the last two months is at an end. Representatives of the exchanges, while denying that any combination has taken place, confidently predict that cut-throat competition has ceased. Abe Warner, of Warner's Features, was in town several days and before he left he stated that he had discovered evidences of a combination. Certain exhibitors told him that while they were anxious to use the Warner Features they had been told that if they made a practice of renting features not handled by the regular exchanges they would not be able to get fillers. Before he left Los Angeles for San Francisco whence, after a week's stay he will depart for New York, Mr. Warner announced that within the next three months his concern will be able to furnish exhibitors with full programs. In other words he has decided to handle single reel subjects of the Warner quality along with the multiple reel features. While he was here he arranged for the location of a permanent branch office in this city and also made a tentative agreement under the terms of which a producing company will probably begin operating in this field within the next three months making Warner features exclusively.

Mexican Picture Causes Protest.

International complications threaten to arise out of the exhibition of a three-reel review of the recent revolutions in the City of Mexico. The picture was released as a special feature by the Universal company. When it was shown at the Plaza theater in this city so many complaints were lodged with the Mexican consul that he visited the theater to see it. He was incensed at some of the statements made in the sub titles and at once filed a formal protest with the United States District Attorney. In an effort to quiet the situation in the most expeditious way the question was referred to the local board of censors. The board viewed the film and decided that it had no authority to suppress it. While there was undoubtedly much in it to offend the Mexican government, the source of the objection was purely political and not moral. Most of the Mexican consul's objections were well founded. For example, one scene purported to show the court martial of Felix Diaz. The prisoner was dragged in loaded down with chains, was roughly handled and apparently was summarily disposed of. The Mexican consul protested that the man alleged to be Diaz did not bear the slightest resemblance to him and that the scene misrepresented the Mexican practice of holding courts martial. That the prisoner was not Diaz is undoubtedly true. Twenty persons now living in Los Angeles who are acquainted with him declared that it was not he who was shown in the picture. Furthermore the identical scene, included in another Mexican war picture, was exhibited in several theaters of this city, and passed by the board of censors, before Diaz was arrested by Madero's soldiers. Several other scenes included in this most recent picture and represented to be freshly taken in the City of Mexico were exhibited in this city several months ago and viewed by the board. A picture of an alleged battle is more than two years old and has been run until it is technically "junk." Moreover the original battle is said to have been staged solely for motion picture purposes and it bears all the earmarks. For instance most of the victims wait until they are directly in front of the camera before falling. A portion of the picture is undoubtedly genuine. A great deal of it is, equally without doubt, not what it purports to be. The question which has arisen out of the exhibition of the film is whether the authorities ought to take steps to protect the public from frauds of this kind. To show a film alleging it to be a certain thing when it is actually something different and inferior is undoubtedly obtaining money under false pretenses. The board of censors thinks the question is important and has asked the city attorney whether the ordinance may be amended to include cases of this kind.

Since the censor board declined to suppress the film on the ground that it had no power to do so under the existing ordinance the question has again been taken up with the government officials by the consul and in all probability the matter will come before the department of state. Throughout the three reels the sub-titles were editorial in tone and some of the reflections upon the existing administration in Mexico would possibly be libellous in this country.

Doings at Selig Studio.

Members of the Selig company have been dropping mysterious hints about a wonderful trained ostrich which is now in quarters in the Selig Animal Farm. The big bird has been going to school to a trainer for several weeks and is now ready to graduate next week into another extraordinary animal picture which Colin Campbell will produce. The nature of the bird's accomplishments is being kept a secret, probably so that the picture will not be discounted in interest before its release.

William Selig, head of the company, who has been here for several weeks, returned to Chicago last week but will probably be back within a month. James L. Magee, manager of the Los Angeles branch, meanwhile has started for Honolulu. He sailed from San Francisco April 5 to be gone six or eight weeks. Nominally it is purely a pleasure trip and a vacation. Actually—and confidentially—he will scout around the islands and don't be surprised if a Selig company heads for the South Seas next Fall. All of the directors of the four Selig companies here are keeping busy but except for Campbell's forthcoming ostrich picture nothing sensational is in sight. E. A. Martin has been working in the vicinity of Altadena this week on a Mexican border melodrama with many soldiers and some battle scenes. F. W. Huntley finished an animal picture last week in which a lion killed a camel. Adele Lane, formerly leading woman for the Lubin company in Philadelphia has come on to do emotional leads for Selig. Camille Aster is a new juvenile and ingenue. Mrs. Al Filson, wife of the millionaire actor of the Selig company, is to do characters regularly. She and her husband are old vaudeville favorites under the stage name of Filson & Errol. They were out for several seasons with a sketch "A Tip on the Derby" the first successful sketch ever written by George M. Cohan. Since those days they saved their money and invested it in California orange groves which have yielded them a fortune.

News Briefs.

Wilbert Melville, Lubin producer, has just put on another company and will double the output from the Lubin studio at 4550 Passadena avenue in this city. Bert Bracken, formerly Melies' director, who recently returned from Tahiti, is directing one of the companies and Frank Shaw, a former Selig director, has charge of the other. Melville is generally supervising the plant which is growing in extent every week. It is one of the busiest studios in this vicinity.

Arthur Mackley, Essanay director, disbanded his company this week. Part of the people went north to the Niles studio, others journeyed east and a few who preferred to remain in Los Angeles joined other companies. In a few days Mackley will leave from New York on his way to Scotland where he will visit his birthplace which he has not seen for more than a quarter of a century. He will take a vacation of a couple of months and on his return may assemble another company and reopen the Los Angeles studio.

The Los Angeles field lost another important motion picture company last week when S. V. Taylor and Marion Leonard and the other members of the Monopol company closed the Hollywood studio and departed for New York to occupy the new studio there which is said to be completed.

After a vacation of two or three weeks the members of the Pathe West Coast company have been reassembled by Director James Young Deer who is putting on another of his famous Indian pictures.

From the windows of the interurban cars running between Los Angeles and Pasadena passengers may observe a group of new buildings arising on the highest bluff of Brooklyn Heights overlooking the car line. They only serve to indicate how little truth there is in the reports that the Thanhouser company is preparing to return to New Rochelle. On the contrary the studio is being improved every week and it is already one of the most completely equipped in Los Angeles.

The film production of Hawthorn's great classic "The Scarlet Letter," was given its studio run at the Kinemacolor studio this week. It is probably the last multiple production which David Miles will attempt for several weeks. When it reaches the screen it is probable that the intense dramatic values Miles found in it will make the deepest impression, although photographically it is fully up to the recent Kinemacolor standards.

What's one man's loss is another's gain. In the recent fire at the Universal company's Hollywood offices about $10,000 worth of photoplay scripts which had been accepted and paid for were destroyed. This means that the company is in urgent need of scripts. Business is now being transacted in a temporary rough-board building. Meanwhile a square block of property has been obtained directly across Sunset Boulevard and new offices and studios are to be erected there.

H. M. Lauson, proprietor of LaMara theater, the newest, finest and largest motion picture house in Phoenix, Arizona, according to his view, visited Los Angeles this week and made the rounds of the local picture theaters. He was hunting for ideas for the improvement of his own house.

CLYMER LEAVES GAUMONT.

John B. Clymer, Manager of Advertising and Sales of the Gaumont Company, has resigned, having been retained by a leading magazine to conduct investigations for a series of articles on municipal conditions. At the conclusion of the time needed for this work he will return to the film business.

Mr. Clymer entered the motion picture industry from the newspaper business. He has been connected with the New York Herald, Globe, Morning Telegraph, Sun and Philadelphia Record. He also performed publicity work for large corporations, having been New York manager of the bureau conducting publicity for the Chesapeake & Ohio Railway, the Norfolk and Western Railway, the Old Dominion Steamship Line and Frank Jay Gould.

PEARL WHITE VISITS MERIDEN.

A great reception was accorded Miss Pearl White, the ever popular and famous star of Crystal Films, upon her personal appearance at the Majestic Theater, Danbury, Conn., last Monday evening. Manager Meehan of the Majestic shows Crystal Films and his patrons are well acquainted with Miss White's work though Miss White has never appeared personally before them. Mr. Meehan thought that this would be a good opportunity for his patrons to become better acquainted with their favorite and he engaged her. A great crowd was on hand and she was made to feel at home immediately by the enthusiastic way in which she was received. Miss White gave a very interesting talk on the pictures and her work in Crystal Films and the audience was so well pleased that the manager has asked her to play a return date.

"THE BURDEN BEARER" (Lubin).

This is an intense story which upon the stage would be called a problem play. Arthur Johnson plays the star role, which is a strong type. The picture is made in one reel, but has all of the intensity of a three-act drama and will add to the Lubin record of making powerful photo stories.

Robert Neville, a naval officer, returns from a cruise to find that Agnes, his mother's ward, has transferred her affections to his younger brother, Dudley. Dudley, however, has fallen under the influence of Cecelia Dean, a beautiful vampire. Robert resolves at any cost to break up the attachment which, if consummated, would decimate the family happiness. He makes violent love to the vampire and in her inordinate vanity she falls in love with Robert and discards the younger brother. This causes a bitter feeling on Dudley's part and the brothers quarrel, the mother and Agnes favoring Dudley. Robert, however, plays his role until the younger brother and Agnes are married. He then turns on Cecelia and tells her that he never cared for her and leaves her to the agony of a non-requited love, while he goes forth to take up his duties, none thanking him for having taken up their burden.

By Hugh King Harris.

LET us stand, if you will, for a moment in the place of the manager of the motion-picture theater in the average town, and watch for a day the different phases of the business. It is a most interesting proposition as viewed from various angles. If I burlesque some points a trifle, keep in mind that what I say is founded on actual occurences related by managers of various houses, on facts, not fancy.

The house is to open at ten o'clock A. M., the film is to come in by express, and there has been a wreck on the road, the feature has been billed heavily. The posters have been up and folks are looking toward seeing something worth while. Jacks, the manager, phones the express office.

"Hello, that film in yet? What, a wreck on the P. & O.? The deuce! How soon do you expect it? By noon sure! Say, man, we open at 10, the thing's billed and we stand to lose a nice bunch of money."

He turns from the phone perplexed, the films of the day before are boxed ready for shipment out, on the train that the feature was to come in on. Morning business is always good here; to wait two mortal hours without films is to face a loss of the real profits of the day. But such is life. Just then the phone rings. "Hello, yes, this is Jacks; what, Mary sick, won't be down today? All right, I'll see what I can do."

More bad news, the cashier sick, some one must be pressed into service at once to handle the box office. It is close to ten and folks have already paused, lounging about the lobby, real money is waiting to be taken. Jacks scowls, a hurry call and he locates a girl he knows will be O. K. He is about to call the express office again but feels that will be useless, they know his plight and will send the film as soon as it comes.

Now a shrill whistle from the speaking tube to the operating booth gives promise of more trouble, and sur eenough, the operator finds the projecting machine has a broken sprocket and it will take some time to fix it.

"Everything in bunches," mutters Jacks and tells the musicians who are waiting that nothing will be doing until noon. But as gloom is settling thick and fast the express wagon dashes up, and lo and behold, the unexpected has occurred, the film has arrived, twenty-five minutes late, yes, but that's a small matter under the circumstances. A sharp blow on the speaking tube whistle and the operator "thinks" ten minutes more will fix her. So finally all is ready and Jacks takes up his station at the ticket box. A well advertised feature has brought out a good crowd and soon the tickets are dropping merrily into the box.

The speaking tube whistle blows, it is another bit of trouble, possibly ten minutes or so. Instructions are sent down to the orchestra and the singer is forced into quick action and by strenuous musical stunts the original ten minutes, stretched to half an hour, is passed.

"Gee, mister, I can't hang around here all morning; I came to see a show, not to hear a cheap concert.' It is a red-faced, portly man speaking. His nickel is returned without question. But the next party who departs snorts something about blanked fakes anyway, these snide cheap theaters. Jacks takes it all coolly. It is part of the daily grind.

Now all is going smoothly, it is some feature all right, folks commence to applaud and Jacks knows he has the crowd with him at last. As the audience departs comments of Bully," "Some class" or "It was awfully interesting, don't you think," take the sting out of the episode of the disgruntled folks who left earlier in the morning.

Noon comes; with the regular cashier off duty, Jacks eats a hasty bite and is soon back on duty. Here comes a big lady, loaded with bundles, a weazened little fellow, with sparse gray whiskers trails along meekly, in the rear.

He carries a tin pail with a card board cover tied on it, it seems very precious. The fat lady gurgles. "Oh say, mister ticket man, would you oblige a lady by taking care of the pail while we see the pictures? It is a present for Susan Ann, that's my husband's cousin. Gold fish, yes, she dotes on gold fish. But do be careful and don't set them so near the register, you will kill them; and do keep them out of the draft; don't spill the water. There's a good man, ever so much obliged, we won't be in long, come along Jasper"—and she stalks down the aisle, Jasper following in the rear with never a word. Jacks heaves a sigh of relief and rapidly gathers in the pasteboards of the crowd who has had to wait for the fat lady to get rid of her burden and her tale of woe.

"Three men sat on a dead man's chest, yo heave ho"—bang, and the doors fly open, a whiff of onions and whiskey strikes Jacks' nostrils. A burly sailor, three sheets to the wind comes stalking in, bumps against the ticket box and leers cunningly at Jacks, who sees trouble in sight, right there.

"Say, old sport, shiver my timbers, let a man cast anchor, will you?"

Jacks none too gently shoves the sailor out the door, but just outside the entrance (Jacks is very glad it is outside), the sailor turns with an oath and raises a wicked slug shot; Jacks ducks, and luckily the officer passing is on time, the sailor is hauled away and Jacks resumes his duties.

"Mister, does the show run all day for a nickel?" it is a little old woman who asks the question, Jacks sizes up the rusty bonnet, the thin face and eager eyes. The gloves have no tips. "Someone from God knows where, no money and wants to fill in time." Jacks sizes up things in a hurry. Kindly he explains that one may stay as long as one likes and she goes on in, and Jacks pretends not to notice the lack of a ticket.

Out in front, the big frame with the actors and actresses of the feature company is standing. A rural couple stroll up, gaze at the photos of the players and Hiram remarks in a loud nasal twang, "Guess, Marthy, that curly headed lad must be some good tenor singer. Let's go in and hear the concert." And in they enter, believing the place a regular theater and the players musical artists.

A smart young fellow comes in and leans against the back seat rail. He is one of the floaters and pretends to be so very much of the world. Suddenly on the street is the clang of the fire bells, the department is rushing by.

"Gee, there's a fire," the wise boy calls loudly to Jacks and dashes hastily out the door. Jacks scowls as he sees several patrons in the rear seats shift nervously.

"The fool," mutters the manager, "it takes less than that to start a panic, at times," he saunters carelessly down into the aisle and the folks keep their eyes on him, but his manner reassures them and no trouble comes of the incident.

Now the fat lady of the gold fish comes out and suspiciously inspects the gold fish with a sniff and no thanks to Jacks goes out.

"No dogs allowed in here, madam," this to a flashily dressed young woman who has a big bull terrier on the end of a chain.

"Well, you have a nerve. I have him chained and can sit in the rear." Her voice rises shrill and Jacks calms her as best he can, but she makes a nasty scene before she leaves and Jacks wishes she and her dog in most any place at all, so long as it is away from him.

The day goes on and many fool questions are asked and answered, a fight in the lobby is stopped, a "rough neck" in the audience subdued and ejected.

A short time for supper, and the night doorman comes on. Jacks has a bit of time to himself, but the singer, a young tenor, gets mixed up with some friends and doesn't show up for evening service on time. The extra singer is hastily secured, after a deal of grumbling, and goes on.

The advertising for the next day and the day after is gone over, the janitor makes a "touch," on the plea of illness, a new part is ordered for the machine, and many other duties are disposed of.

It is pretty late when Jacks gets to bed, tired, with some important matters to call him out early the next morning. He has had a "full day" surely, yet some folks sigh with envy at the manager's "job," a bed of roses, maybe, but ever rose has its thorns, and every manager can point out a whole lot of these same thorns if you will but ask him.

Here is Your Library, Mr. Exhibitor.

The Motion Picture Annual, published by the Chalmers Publishing Company, is a small encyclopedia. The exhibitor can always turn to it with confidence. It has been prepared by practical moving picture men, who know and understand the needs of the exhibitor. Add this to your library forthwith, for it costs but one dollar and twenty-five cents in paper covers or $1.50 in cloth boards. It is fully worth it. The best writers in the motion picture field have provided the literary matter in it. The complete list of releases for 1912 (Licensed and Independent) and the classified trade directory are worth something to you, many times the price perhaps.

Where's the Picture?

R. J. TINDELL writes that he sends a picture of his theater. It must have been taken with one of those pinhole cameras on a pinhead plate, for it was too small to be discovered in the envelope. If he'll send another picture that is visible to the naked eye, we'll be glad to use it since it concerns a special advertising stunt.

If you get a special lobby display get someone to make a photograph of it and send it along. We're always glad to get photographs that concern advertising displays, though this department does not use house front pictures unless specially dressed for some scheme.

Please Kill a Printer.

We wish that Mr. Tindell would take a day off soon and kill the printer who makes reference to "Bunyon" and his Pilgrim's Progress. A man like that is liable to refer to G. Washungton. Mr. Tindell has been having the Pilgrim's Progress in his house, the Grand Theater, Valdosta, Ga., and writes that it brought in the church people who seldom if ever attend a picture theater. He says:

> There were several parties; the Sunday School teachers and their classes, the High School baseball team and the visitors (there was a game in the afternoon), twenty-eight school teachers and most of the ministers. Ministers and teachers were admitted free. In my opinion by inviting ministers and teachers, we got in others who do not, as a rule, attend photoplay theaters.

That's what this department has been telling right along and the fact that Mr. Tindell broke all his records proves the point, if it needed proving. A minister in your theater doesn't just mean a minister. It means his endorsement, it means the presence of his parishioners, it means that the children of the latter find the ban lifted, it means, in a word, a better appreciation of what a photoplay performance is on the part of those who, through ignorance, have supposed it to be what some sensational papers have painted it as being.

Announcement Extraordinary.
Religious Vision Drama
Pilgrim's Progress.
The Grand Theater's
Easter Program, Saturday, March 22nd.

The only comment to be made is that there is no reference to the fact that this is a visualization of John Bunyan's story. Most persons will get that fact without further elaboration, but it is better to be definite.

Below the heavy type is the statement that it is in four reels, lasting about an hour and a half, some personal commendation from ministers and others in cities where the subject had been shown, the statement that ministers and school teachers were invited to be the guests of the management at the matinee showings, the prices and times of showing. It is a well written and well balanced advertisement; not too loud in tone, but emphatic.

One Good Point.

These religious subjects, if well made and of due reverence, can do a world of good to a house. But the management must back up the subject, not alone through judicious booming but by making the surroundings aid in the effect created by the picture. If you can gain a better effect by putting in an organ and hiring a church organist in place of your regular pianist, do so, even though the added expense threatens to wipe out your profit. Do all you can to further the impression and the money spent will come back, not after many days, but many days thereafter, for you will have broken down the reserve of some of the prejudiced and will have made fans of some of those who have regarded photoplay theaters as little better than dance halls.

Had Many Inquiries.

Mr. Tindell adds that he has had many inquiries as to some of the schemes recently mentioned in this department and that he has been glad to reply as fully as possible in the interests of the business in general. The willingness of many managers to help others is one of the most pleasant features of the business. In many respects it is unusual. But now and then this courtesy is abused. We had a letter this morning from a man who wanted some small town exhibitor to tell him how to run a small town theater. That is taxing courtesy too far.

And if you write a brother exhibitor, send a self-addressed and stamped envelope. It's the least you can do to save him trouble.

The Other Extreme.

The Bryn Mawr (Pa.) Theater goes to the other extreme in a twelve-page and cover program. One-third of six of the twelve inside pages is given to the house and the rest is sold to the foreign advertisers. Worse still, effective use has not been made of the space at command. The outside advertising is more or less effectively displayed, but the program is crowded into a space 2¼ by 2¾, the three subjects being announced in a ten point that looks more like an eight. It is all straight work, only the twelve point date and a twenty-four point "Program" being in bold type, the announcement looking something like this:

PROGRAM
SATURDAY, MARCH 29th
Pathe Drama—Romeo and Juliet (Two-reel Feature)
Essanay Comedy—The Girl in the West
Vitagraph Drama-Topical—Buttercups and The Panama Canal
Selig Comedy—The Early Bird
One Good Farce Comedy

This has little or no pulling power, even the features are given the same unimportant looking type.

In the vacant boxes on either side of this program there are a few catch-lines still in ten point Roman. "The Little Minister" and "The Prisoner of Zenda" get the same size type and the same white face as "Mention this program when patronizing our advertisers." The third and fourth cover pages carry no matter whatever—and a five reel "Prisoner of Zenda," with James K. Hackett, among the coming attractions with a college full of girls in the town!

The house carries an excellent announcement in its program front with an intelligent discussion of fire risks, but it makes no use of advertising space that other people pay money to use. It would pay to put a press man in charge of the program who can evolve better lines than "Every attraction is the best obtainable." It's a waste of opportunity at present.

The Difference.

Look at this program. If the printer does his work, it is more our idea of what things should be:

PROGRAM
Tuesday, March 18th
ROMEO AND JULIET
A splendid Pathe two-part feature
THE GIRL IN THE WEST
A classy Essanay comedy
BUTTER CUPS
A Vitagraph
THE EARLY BIRD
A Selig Comedy
THE PANAMA CANAL
Late Vitagraph pictures of the big ditch
And another farcical photoplay

Then, in the spare spaces talk specific points. There is page after page that could be printed of the "Prisoner of Zenda," other pages of "The Little Minister." Don't print the pages. Boil them down into paragraphs. Make your program talk for you. Take your own medicine and use your own advertising space to advantage.

And Now It's Smithers.

C. T. Smithers is the latest to fall in line with a weekly. The first issue of the Idle Hour Educator, Aberdeen, S. D., is dated March 15th. It is an eight-page paper, six by nine inches, the three inside right hand pages carrying advertisements of coming specials. It is in no sense a weekly program, but a weekly paper consisting of part press work and part general matter from various uncredited sources. The common mistake of using too large a type has not been made, a condensed ten-point being used that is at once clear and compact. The five pages of reading matter are about equally divided between booming and miscellany, but it is all readable and when Mr. Smithers remembers to change a lifted paragraph to conform to its new surrounding, it will be well edited. As an example of what is meant he lifts a Universal item that speaks of "one of our cowboys," though it is plain that even in South Dakota cowboys are not regularly attached to photoplay theaters.

In one paragraph he bewails the fact that some lost articles have been in storage for nearly a year. If he will take a tip from the Isis News, he'll run a Lost and Found department and get rid of them.

Just the same it's a fine start and a much more presentable sheet in its first issue than many that have run a much longer time. It's the Smithers' way to do things well. The answer is found in this paragraph from the Aberdeen American:

> Mr. Smithers was formerly one of the best known editors of South Dakota and for years published his weekly, which was a political and social power. He has since gone into the moving picture business and his latest venture is a return in a way to his early day activities.
> The Idle Hour Educator is a two-column, eight-page pamphlet, issued every Saturday and its circulation is 2,000 from the start, enough to leave a copy at the door of every home in Aberdeen. Ten carrier boys constitute its delivery force. It has no mail service and the subscription price is nil.

Fill-Ups.

The Topline Indicator, the house organ of the M. P. Sales Agency, London, has started a column of what it calls "Program Fill-Ups," brief, snappy items about the players of the companies whose subjects they handle. The idea is a good one and we think it would pay the manufacturers here to follow this example and send out a press sheet with their bulletin slips. The Kalem Kalendar is the only printing of the Licensed side to give good program matter and on the Independent end the Eclair publication gives about all that comes from that side. With the growing use of programs, the manufacturers are overlooking cheap but most valuable publicity. It would not cost much to get out such a sheet, but even the Vitagraph Bulletin does not give the gossip that would come in so handy to many managers, excellent as that publication is in other helps.

Answers Questions.

Ralph Talbot, of the Palace Theater, Tulsa, Okla., has a new idea that he passes on to the rest. He writes:

> Having been a reader of your publication for a number of years, and more recently a close observer of your "Advertising for the Exhibitor" Department, I wish to contribute a method of advertising which I believe is original, although it was suggested by your inquiry department.
> I show a slide, and carry an ad in the daily papers to this effect:
> PALACE THEATER
> Motion Picture Inquiry Day
> EVERY THURSDAY
> Any question you wish to ask about the pictures, or the players, send by mail to the PALACE
> Answers will be given here each performance on Thursday each week
> I answer the questions received the previous week each Thursday and write a few questions myself, concerning the safety of the projection apparatus, the fire exits, coming feature pictures, etc.
> I was surprised at the number of questions that I have received. And it not only increases the patronage on Thursday, but it conveys to them the knowledge that you are striving to entertain them in every way.
> I believe if you publish this scheme in your magazine, it will interest many exhibitors.

This is in refreshing contrast to many managers who throw a veil of mystery about the pictures, either because they do not or will not know, and who return grouchy replies to the simplest questions. The courteous reply to questions, no matter how silly they may seem to you, will do much to make friends for the house. This goes a step further and results in a little lecture that cannot but interest those who are interested in the pictures. We are always ready to give what help we may to the manager who needs assistance in this direction.

Noisy, But Good.

> Scoop
> We've got 'em.
> The Man They Scorned !
> The Elephant Sleuth !
> Wonderland.

There's a lot of small type in between, but any man who got that circular would get those lines and they form the whole story. The rest is supplemental. That much would sink in in the single glance that is given instinctively before the sheet is thrown away. Not a sheet of that paper will be wasted. Most of the announcements will be real. It's good and black even though printed on cheap, pink stock and it gets over.

We hope that Bert I. Williams, who sends the copy in, gives the printer a cigar occasionally for getting his ideas out in good shape. And he should hand himself a smoke more frequently because he has ideas to give the printer. Pick out the big lines and have them set so that the reader will get them at the first glance. Then build up on that with the smaller type. Here's some of the smaller type:

> This comedy is assuredly one of the best things ever attempted. It is a delicious mirth provoker, and we guarantee the hardiest stoic on the face of the globe will not be able to prevent his features from relaxing into a broad grin after gazing at this picture.

No Vaudeville, But—

Arthur G. Pearson, of Pearson's Perfect Pictures, Melrose, Somerville and Winter Hill, Mass., writes:

> We have never put in vaudeville and what is the consequence? Instead of nasty criticism, we have the best people in the city, and they go away with nothing but praise and commendation.

Evidently the local editors are pleased and praising patrons of Pearson's Perfect Pictures, for he sends a bunch of clippings, most of which are editorial comment in appreciation of the Pearson enterprise.

Mr. Pearson is inclined to use too much type in his advertisements. Ten lines with a punch and "pep" is a better advertisement than twenty or thirty lines of synopsis, but he's dead right on the vaudeville proposition. The sort of vaudeville a photoplay theater can afford has no place with the sort of pictures the cheapest place gets.

Isis Improvements.

The Isis News, Trinidad, Colo., under the editorship of Jack Nash, who also owns the house, has added a Lost and Found column to its other features. It is a good idea for a weekly paper or program. Try it. Then, to convince the advertisers, he explains that on the first issue of the column five of the lost articles were claimed the first thing Monday morning, showing that the paper is closely read. The paper is read, anyhow, for even the film boosts are well done. Here is something that others can use by changing the name of the house:

> See good pictures and you'll feel better. See them at the Isis and we'll feel better, too.

Souvenirs were given out St. Patrick's Day and pretty soon three vacuum cleaners are going to be awarded the same day. Going some?

Gone, Hats and All.

Carey Wilson, his green caterpillar chapeau and the glossy silk tile that he sometimes wears when he comes to New York, have all left Rutherford, N. J., and the Criterion theater, to come to New York to handle the bookings of "The Prisoner of Zenda" for the Sherry Company, owners of the New York State rights. Apart from his peculiar hats, Wilson is truly notable as being the one man who turned down a government job under the present administration. He did run over to Washington and handle the distribution of tickets for the Government grand stands at the inauguration, but he scorns a regular job under his Uncle Sam and Woodrow, preferring to make his stand with photoplay. He has done good work for the Criterion. We think he will do better with his broader field, for he has brains under his amusing headgear.

Says He Isn't.

Melvin G. Winstock, of the People's Amusement Company, Portland, Oregon, denies that he is dead without knowing it. He explains that personal affairs have occupied what little spare time he had and goes on to prove his existence by making a few remarks, to wit:

> I arise at this time to make the suggestion to the manufacturers that in pictorial paper which they send out to the exhibitors, they put on the paper, whether it is one, two, three, four or five reels, so as to let the public know when a manager is sufficiently enterprising to put on stuff over 1000 feet in length. Have something on the paper to tell the public of that fact, and they cannot make it too prominent. A great many of the producers fail in this respect and put it up to the exhibitor. By giving direct attention to this, the factory will be doing its duty and helping the exhibitor.
> The importance of this lies in the fact, say take a house running four reels and one of those attractions is a three reel feature. There is only one kind of paper in the lobby, and the public come up, glance at the pictorial showing, and walk away, not stopping to consider that one of the pictures is a two, three or four reel production.
> On last Sunday, March 23d, we started a week's engagement of Frederick Warde in Richard III. We secured a splendid set of Shakespeare in 20 volumes, and advertised rather broadly that we would give this set of Shakespeare to the boy or girl attending high school who wrote the best essay on the production, there being but one requirement, that they see the picture at the Peoples Theater, and so affirm. In response to this there have been at least 1000 students who have come to the theater to see Richard III, and essays are coming in rapidly.
> I enclose herein a newspaper clipping telling of a little experience which occurred at one of our theaters at the initial performance of the picture. Of course, we kept the man for the rest of the exhibitions, and he made good.

Strips Will Do.

The suggestion is a good one, but we think that the use of the strips supplied by Hennegan, Jacobs and others that read "Complete in two parts," or whatever the number of reels. This is not as elegant as the announcement on the poster itself, but unless the poster statement is obtrusive to the point of obliterating the pictorial space the strip with its inch and a half or two inch letter is far more prominent and to the point. By all means have the announcement of the number of parts on the poster, but where it is desired to emphasize the number of parts, have recourse to the strips.

The clipping enclosed relates how, when The Honor System was shown in one of the theaters owned by the People's Amusement Company, an honor man in the audience got up and was moved to lecture the film. Very naturally, Winstock retained him for the day, but we'd like to bet a day's smokes that Winstock planted the man in the audience in the first place. Perhaps he's not dead, after all, but we reserve judgment until he strikes his old-time gait.

Effective.

The most recent program of the Tenth Street Theater, Kansas City, comes out in a cover in bronze red on a lilac tint. This is a rather heavy lilac and a decidedly heavy red. Try the combination sometime when you want something striking and yet not gaudy. Take plenty of time for the job as the red does not dry quickly and is liable to offset.

Made the President Help.

The Aberdeen theater, Chicago, used the inauguration pictures, and in the lobby displayed a personal letter to the management from the President. It was merely a form letter, one of the sort that went out from Princeton by the thousands during the campaign, but it was a letter from the President to the management, and somehow, it seemed to give an intimate touch to the announcement that crowded the house. They sent a photograph of the poster and letter, but what happened to it in the mail was a shame.

The PHOTOPLAYWRIGHT

Conducted by Epes Winthrop Sargent

The Next Dinner.

AT a recent meeting of the Inquest Club it was decided to wind up the season with a photoplay writers' dinner, probably at the Taverne Louis, Saturday evening, May 31st, when the club will probably disband for the summer. At this dinner, as at the last, any person interested in photoplay writing, either as author, editor, producer, player or manufacturer, is eligible to attend.

It is the hope of the club to eclipse the two dinners previously held and bring together a truly representative gathering of those interested in the production of photoplays. We are making an early start that all may be advised in time.

Particulars as to time and place will be announced later, but in the meantime mark down the date and refuse all engagements for that evening. The previous dinners, the last of which led to the formation of the Inquest Club, have done splendid service in bringing together those who write and those who produce, and much good has resulted from these gatherings. It is hoped that at the coming dinner everyone within reaching distance of New York will be in attendance. Begin to get ready to attend, and watch for later announcements.

Send Your Carbons.

If you have sent to Universal, read this from Richard Willis:

> As you doubtless know, our Western offices were burnt down recently, and a number of scenarios and all of our records were burnt. We would very much appreciate the courtesy of a notice in your paper to the effect that we will be glad to receive carbon copies of any scripts in our hands before March 26th and will give them immediate consideration.

Change American's Address.

The American Filim Manufacturing Co. asks that all manuscripts be sent to the studios at Santa Barbara, Calif., and not to Chicago. This change will affect a considerable saving in time and lessen the chances of loss, while assuring direct action.

The Reason Why.

Mrs. Emily B. Heininger, the latest addition to the Essanay script room, delivered herself of this poem:

The saddest word that's been said yet
Is the editor's favorite word, regret.

Then they had to take her to the hospital and remove her appendix. She does not state that the poem was the reason why but we're entitled to our own opinion.

Cut Ammex Off.

This is a communication from H. K. Eakle:

> In order to protect scenario writers from loss I will be very pleased if you will kindly make known through your Photoplaywright Department, that the Ammex Motion Picture Mfg. Co. is not at present in the market for scripts, as they have suspended operations.
> I am aware that a number of scripts have been received recently, and I fear that any others may not receive the proper attention, as the company has no editor.
>
> This is written to avoid any unpleasantness for the authors, and to relieve me, personally, from any responsibility, inasmuch as I have been attending to the photoplays submitted to the company of late.

Get Outdoors.

Companies are coming back from the south, and those stay-at-homes who have been sticking close to the studio all winter are now looking for outdoor scripts. If the "mostly interior" stuff comes back, set it aside until October, and frame the new scripts to be played for the greater part out of doors.

Of course the California companies work out of doors the year round, but with some of the eastern companies the style is changing, and the "all interior" stuff that was snatched up so eagerly in December is now despised, because the glass studio is first cousin to an oven when the sun beats down, and it is far more pleasant to get into autos and go out into the country with a rural play.

If You Live In New Orleans.

There are a lot of photoplay writers in New Orleans. We have the name of one of these who is willing to undertake to start a New Orleans circle of the Inquest Club. If you want to belong send in your name.

Our Little List.

Add these to the list of old time plots:

By Ashton Crawford.

The convict who escapes and robs an innocent man of his clothes, thereby causing another to appear (temporarily) as the jail-bird.

The story of the writing on the egg which is relegated to cold storage for 20 years; then to be discovered by a love-lorn man who seeks out the writer who by this time has at least one unromantic husband and a brood of children.

The war-play in which the heroine's brother acts as spy and is discovered and shielded by the hero.

The pathetic Mother-Play in which Thanksgiving and pumpkin pies tug hard at the heart-strings.

The play in which the rich crippled-child is contrasted with the poor strong child, and in which the two are brought together and exchange notes—and money.

By Frank A. Kramer.

The child lost early in life. Later identified by a locket.

The husband jealous of his wife's brother, whom he has never seen.

The burglar who breaks into a house to be confronted by his own child who has been adopted by the family.

The policeman who calls on the cook, removes his hat and coat, which are used by another.

That Inquest Club.

We have figured out that something like twenty sales have already resulted from the meetings of the Inquest Club including the chance of one member to get in touch with a company needing fiction.

Now, the Inquest Club does not offer any such inducement. It merely says that you can learn things about technique if you gather with your fellow writers and talk shop. There are no selling hints given out and no plots are supposed to be commented upon before they are written, but the getting together assuredly has had an effect entirely unexpected. If there was only the social side it would be worth your time and the small investment for refreshment that you make, but you learn things, too. If you want to come in send us a self-addressed postal card and we'll tell you when the next meeting will be, or send several and you'll be advised whenever you are not there. There are no fees, no dues, no responsibility of any sort. Sing out.

Not With Essanay.

Arthur Leeds writes that he is not "with Essanay," as we stated, though he has done much work for that company. The mistake is due to a statement from T. E. Letendre, the hesitant editor of the Photoplay Author. Mr. Leeds is a free lancer and the associate of J. Berg Esenwein in the latter's photoplay course that will be a real correspondence course if it lives up to the other Esenwein propositions along short story lines. If the course is what we think it is, we shall be glad to welcome a real mail course that will be conducted by persons whose credit and establishment is too high to permit them to engage in a swindling scheme.

Postal Scales.

We note that there are all sorts of parcels post postal scales offered now that will weigh up to eleven pounds by half ounces. They are nice things if you don't care what sort of a reputation you get, but if you want to get in right, throw away the spring scale of any sort and get a regular post office scale with a beam weight. It will cost you three of four dollars; two or three times what the spring balances cost, but you are certain that the stuff is properly weighed.

"Stuff."

We had a very indignant letter from a very indignant lady the other day because we referred to her "stuff." She wrote that it might be stuff but it was the best she could do and she was only a beginner.

We write stuff. We sell stuff. Whatever we write or sell is stuff. Stuff is anything that is written, good, bad or in between. It is plain slang, but like "bully," "rotten," and one or two other words it has been accepted into the newspaper and studio language as being brief and descriptive. Stuff, in a word, is not a term of contempt.

Thinking Them Up.

It just happened not long ago that when a chap told us of the great idea he had for a story we were able to locate the title way back in 1911. He had not the slightest idea that he was stealing from the Biograph company, but the comedy had made an impression on him at the time and now that he is searching his brain for ideas, he hit upon this and thought it good. It was good, but it is the property of the Biograph, for like so many of their ideas it was so well marked as to be distinctive.

When you get an inspiration, try and remember where you got it and train yourself to remember sources. It helps a lot in avoiding charges of plagiarism. At best we all trespass now and then. Do not do it more than you can help.

Stamped Envelopes.

In three days it has cost us thirty eight cents for stamps and about ten cents for envelopes to reply to questions that do not in the least contribute to our income. One was from a man who wanted us to tell him all about how to write photoplays and it ran from there to a man who wanted to join the Inquest Club and who had twice gone to a place that is not our office to ask about it.

We do not begrudge the cost of the stamps and stationery, but we do hate like the very deuce to address envelopes to people who are too lazy or too ignorant to enclose the reply envelop that the commonest courtesy demands should be sent when a favor is asked.

It's a funny thing that ninety-nine per cent. of the people who want to know where they can buy the Technique of the Photoplay send a reply envelope with the inquiry, but the man who wants to get eight or ten dollars' worth of information free doesn't do it.

It's the same way when you write editors. If you are asking a question send a stamp for reply and don't stick the stamp to your letter head, but put it on a self addressed envelope.

Just About Right.

Herman A. Blackman has been studying the market and this is the result of his studies:

> I believe that editors buy their stuff much like I buy my groceries, mainly from a few tried and dependable sources. If I see a bargain at a strange grocery I snap it up, but it must be unusual. My ordinary stuff I buy of one grocer for I have tried him and found him dependable. In like manner I believe that the editor buys his ordinary stuff from some tried and dependable men. I want to become one of these men and I am willing to work hard and long to do it.

That's the whole selling scheme in a nutshell. Jim Jones writes a story and so does Joe Smith. They are both fair stories though neither is out of the ordinary. But Jim sends in six or eight scripts a month. Many of these have been put on and they get on the screen in pretty good shape. Joe has sent in only a couple that have not been good. Naturally the editor will give the preference to Jim, because he knows that Joe may not turn in another good one in six months, but Jim will have a couple up to standard in next week and next month. If Joe comes in with a story twice as good as Jim's the editor will give Joe the check, but other things being equal, it is a better plan to encourage the evenly good writer who knows precisely what the studio wants and can supply a story up to mark and sometimes beyond.

If you are not yet up to the point where you can always deliver the goods, send out only the occassional unusual. Save the others until, with the practise you gain, you can make these, too, original.

Say Not So.

This from a St. Louis correspondent:

> If I should ever become a successful writer of scenarios I will certainly take you to task for your undisguised contempt for the amateur "scenarian." We probably deserve it, yet I think it spoils the tone of your column.

The writer can take us to task right now and we enter a plea of general denial. When he gets to a point where he learns to drop the obsolete "scenario" (to say nothing of the still more horrible "scenarian"), he will realize that our scorn is not directed at those who are commencing to learn to write photoplays, but at a class of persons who cannot even write a ten line letter, and yet who call themselves photoplay writers and spend half the time they should spend in learning how to write plays telling how stupid the editors are in taking the rot that is produced upon the screen instead of their own well-nigh perfect product, or declaring that this company or that has stolen a valuable idea from them. They cumber the business, they interfere with the success of others by irritating the editors and they never will gain success because they lack the brains to write.

This department is largely for the beginner and it aims to help and develop the earnest, honest aspirant. Both in print and in our personal correspondence we are always ready to help those who deserve help, but we have no use for the man or woman who writes that their scripts are better than the purchased product and that editors are fools and thieves. We are for all photoplay writers, no matter what their stage of development, but we have no time to waste on the hopeless. There's a difference between the man who cannot, but will, and the man who never can, and simply growls.

The American's Viewpoint.

The American company recently purchased the rights to Stewart Edward White's Ashes of Roses for film purposes. Mr. White makes his residence in Santa Barbara, where the American studios are located and this announcement by the company gains interest from that fact.

> Most film makers are keen to secure copyrighted stories by well known authors for reproduction, and while the American does not in any way minimize, in its own opinion, the value of such stories, it nevertheless thinks that in laying your requirements before the author and having your story written to suit local needs, you obtain a distinct advantage over the already writen tale. At the same time the value of well known names can be retained in advertising the film.

The trouble is that the author of the successful novel possesses little technical equipment and will require as much coaching as the veriest novice. Few of the filmed novels have made better stories than the best work of men like Emmett Campbell Hall, William H. Kitchell, George Terwilliger and writers of that class, since most of the charm of the novel lies in the style more than in the plot. The successful fiction author who makes good with photoplay does so in spite of his fiction training rather than because of it.

He Wonders Why.

"I thank you very much for the interest you have taken in my photoplay. However, I do not well understand why you say the same is conventional, because large film manufacturers turn out almost daily much poorer stuff than this."

That's part of a letter, and the writer wonders why he is not a hit with the film makers.

Listen, all you fatuous who see so much that is "not as good" as your heaven-born scripts.

You've got to beat the best, not the worst you see.

If you do, the manufacturers will take yours in place of the stuff they use because they can get no better.

Forty Miles to See His Play.

E. R. Coffin, of El Capitan Ranch, Dexter, N. M., has to go forty miles to Roswell when they put one of his plays on. That is the nearest picture house and he has arranged with the manager to call him on the telephone when one of his subjects is shown. It's an eighty mile round trip, but they are used to little things like that down near the border, but at that it's going some.

Inquiries.

NOTE—Replies cannot be sent by mail. State name of character. Do not ask for "leads" or "that man." Addresses cannot be given here, but a list of studio addresses will be sent for a stamped and self-addressed envelope. Only questions of general interest will be answered. Replies cannot be repeated.

M. N. W.—Sorry, but the American casts have not been coming in lately.

RUBENA—You're getting to be worse than Flossie C. P., and Flossie was funny. No Jack is listed in the cast of "Tamandra." Edwin Carewe married her, and Earl Metcalfe was her friend. We cannot reply to Pathe questions.

ADMIRER—We charge advertising rates for five-word signatures, so we cut you down. We have no means of knowing the Lubin production plans. If you are interested in Bret Harte's poems, watch Kalem for "John Burns at Gettysburg."

H.Z.—Most too many questions for one postcard. William Clifford was Haley, Miss Grace Cunard his wife, Marion Emmons their son as a child, and Ray Myers the son grown. Take a walk along Fourteenth Street and answer the second question for yourself. Remember that all the licensed first runs are shown at the City Theater between 9 o'clock and noon, but not all after that.

MRS. R.—We don't know whether Miss Florence Lawrence is a suffragette or not. She did ride in the parade, but Bunny was in the parade, for that matter. We do not think that Miss Lawrence herself knows when she is going to play again.

W. E. O.—It was Kalem's Prosecuting Attorney you are asking about. Guy Coombs had the title role. The Vitagraph cast does not name the character you ask for. Get material for your oration from The Moving Picture Educator department. This should give you the facts you want. We have nothing other than this.

G. M. T.—We'll use the colored picture of that "handsome god from another world" the first time he is willing to pay for it. We do not "chat" players. You are thinking of the M. P. Story Magazine, aren't you?

B. S.—It is with very great regret that we are compelled to suspend the Kay-Bee identifications until the identifier gets on the job again. At present he is busy with the surgeons in the hospital.

E. A. S.—Mrs. Ed Kimball played Susie's mother in "Susie to Suzanne." Mrs. Turner did play a couple of parts when she was in California with her daughter some time ago, but does not play regularly.

H. L.—Probably the script went to Universal. Address the photoplay department, Mecca Building, New York City. After this keep a carbon copy of your script and save worry. And don't query in four weeks. Be more patient.

AITCH—Not necessary to use two signatures in asking two questions. You cannot copyright an unproduced photoplay without getting Congress to change the present laws. No necessity for it. A night scene is merely an underexposed picture. A picture such as you suggest would become tiresome, because it would be muddy photography throughout. One or two scenes will pass, but not a full thousand feet of moonlight stuff. Better try something else.

T. D.—Edwin S. Porter is announced as the producer of "The Prisoner of Zenda."

E. H.—This department does not concern itself as to where the pictures were made.

E. E.—Arthur Johnson has not left the Lubin company. Don't believe all the gossip you hear. Wait until we print it and you can bank on it.

I. M. G.—See answer to B. S.

RUBENA—Gus Pixley was the sheriff in "The Power of the Camera." Miss Sylvia Ashton was the bride in "A Delivery Package." "Notre Dame" was made in Paris.

B. R. G.—If you are told that your script is similar in theme to one already used, you'll do well to drop it, no matter what you think about it yourself. You'll save time and postage stamps if you improve your spelling before you write more photoplays.

M. J. P.—Sign a name next time. Wilfred Lucas is directing for the Bison brand of the Universal.

CARLOTTA—You are not supposed to see licensed pictures on an independent program, but it frequently happens that you do. Many of these are purchased in the open market abroad and sent back here after they have been run in English or Continental houses. We know that Fielding thing. We won't do it again. The company cast was obscure.

H. Y.—These are the last Kay-Bee identifications before the identifier went to the hospital. Miss Anna Little was Betty Brown in "Smiling Dan." She was the same who played in "The Mosaic Law." Nick Cogley was Mabel's father in "Mabel's Heroes."

L. M. B.—Tom Moore is Owen Moore's brother. The Biograph identifier is still at sea as to the identity of the lady you ask about.

F. C. P.—See just above. Miss Isabelle Lamon was the nurse in "The Higher Duty." Hughie Mack is Captain Bunce of the Captain Barnacle series. Miss Mabel Normand was the girl in "Oh, Those Eyes!" She did not play the other part.

J. C.—If you have more than one good title for a play, pick out the best for the lead and use the others as alternatives; but why waste a lot of good titles on one story? Save them to write plays around. You are supposed to give a short synopsis, a cast of characters and the action by scenes. This is what constitutes a script. You may add property and scene plots if you wish. If your question refers to an additional skeletonized action, we do not think it would help a sale. You state the question rather vaguely.

HICKS—Next time send the rest of your name as an act of courtesy. Then we'll reply to your question.

An Excellent Operating Room Film Box.

It is always a pleasure to this department to recommend a really good article, and the film box manufactured by Mr. Gilmore, of Chicago, comes under that heading. As will be seen by the picture, the box, which costs $15, is divided into three compartments. It is of metal throughout and the walls are double, even those between the compartments being double, thus thoroughly insulating the reels from the heat of any fire which might occur. The cover is divided into three sections, two of which are shown open, and one—the center one—closed. I presume Mr. Gilmore makes these boxes in different sizes. At any rate, I can recommend this device as a thoroughly practical and efficient means of protecting the films while in the operating room. It is thoroughly well made, substantial and solid, and will undoubtedly come as near protecting films in cases of fire as anything I have seen up to date.

An Argument.

Mr. Max Ketchel, San Diego, Cal., wants to know who invented moving pictures. Says he has had an argument and would like to have it settled. That is too big a question to answer in this department, friend Ketchel. To answer it fully would require pages, and there are many claimants. Mr. Thomas A. Edison was the first, so far as I know, to use a continuous celluloid film so that the pictures could be projected on a screen in practical commercial form. The Motion Picture Annual, published by this company, contains a brief history of the moving picture. See advertisement elsewhere in this issue.

A Rewinder.

Mr. L. J. Morton, Pawnee City, Neb., writes:

> Find enclosed drawing of a scheme I am using on my rewinder. In March 1st issue I find an article from Emporia, Kan., entitled "Poor Film Service." Emporia is sure up against it. The only help he can get would be to quit his job and wake that manager of his up. Doesn't he (the aforesaid manager) know by this time that junk service means punk show, and punk show means poor business? Wake up, Mr. Employer-Manager, and hear the little noises all around you! People want a good show, and they will pay to see that kind. Moral: Give it to them, but do not expect your operator to make brick without straw.

As to the rewinder, I did not publish the sketch because the friction is not applied in very good form. It would work all right, but it would be much better to purchase one of the rewinders illustrated on page 372 of the handbook, in which tension is applied in the best possible form. As to Emporia, your remarks concerning the manager are eminently correct. It is strange that managers will be so foolish as to expect an operator to put on a decent show with junk films.

Unsteady Voltage.

Mr. J. P. Cox, Cape May, N. J., writes:

> We use an Edison Model B Projector, of the inside shutter type, with a new Edison lamp, projecting a 12-foot picture at 55 feet. Have been using 50 amperes a. c., through a Hallberg economizer, with very fair results. Would very much like to put in d. c. on account of the superior light it would supply. We can get the d. c. all right, but the line voltage, which is 180 at 7 p. m., drops slowly and steadily until it reaches 150 volts at 11 p. m. Is there any possible way in which we can make use of this current? What kind of rheostat could we use? Would the Edison lamp be satisfactory for direct current? Would a three-wing shutter give better results? How many amperes would the whole thing—rheostat and lamp—consume? Would our light bill be considerably more when using 50 amperes a. c.?

Yes, you could use the current by having a special adjustable rheostat constructed, but your current bills would be very high, as compared to what you are now using. Rather than do that I would suggest that you install either a motor generator set or a mercury arc rectifier of 45-ampere capacity. There is no difference in the lamp required for a. c. and d. c. The Edison three-wing shutter will probably give you somewhat better results than the inside shutter. As to the amount of current consumed, the new handbook tells you all about how to figure that. If you have not a copy I would advise you to procure one from the Moving Picture World at once. Price, $2.50.

Local Union 532.

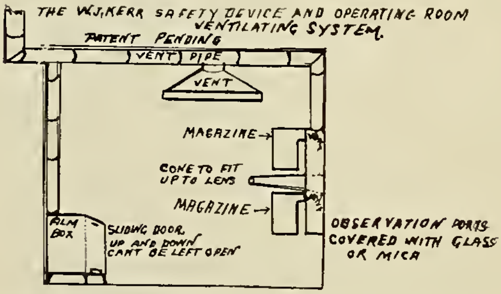
> I am a member of Local 532 I. A. T. S. E. We are progressing very nicely. The boys send you their best regards. Projection here is good and we are striving tooth and nail to keep it that way. Am sending a picture of my operating room. I have a mercury arc rectifier and two Edison type B projectors; also have a choke coil wired in to be used in case of emergency. The projectors are both motor driven. I have one of your old hand books which is worth its price to me ten times over. Will send for one of the new ones soon.

This is the kind of talk I like to hear brother. Projection is your profession and the profession of your brothers in the local, therefore you should not only strive to produce the best possible results, but also use every effort to maintain these results and to improve upon them. The local which goes about things that way will succeed. The union which demands improved conditions, without any attempt to improve the work and the reliability of its own members, may be able to accomplish its purpose, but it will not accomplish it nearly so easily as will the local that demands better conditions of its employers, and also demands better work and greater reliability from its own members. The high class operator—the one who produces high class results on the screen is worth $40 of anybody's money far more than the other article, who produces mediocre results, is worth $15. The first named earns his $40 and earns it well, and the manager is the gainer because the excellence of his operator's work brings money to the box office; but the latter might better be paid to stay away from the house altogether, since the inferiority of his work operates to decrease box office receipts.

An Invention.

Mr. David Carlson, Hazelhurst, Pa., writes:

> Am enclosing photo and sketch of an operating room ventilation and fire protection system invented by W. J. Kerr, of Smithport, Pa. I have my operating room equipped with this system and must say it is great. The newspaper clippings tell of the practical test I gave it. I stayed in the room and ran a song slide, and not a bit of vapor from the fire came into the room. Thought this would interest the boys, as I have always been interested in the new ideas shown in the department.



THE W.J.KERR SAFETY DEVICE AND OPERATING ROOM VENTILATING SYSTEM.
PATENT PENDING
VENT PIPE
VENT
MAGAZINE
CONE TO FIT UP TO LENS
MAGAZINE
FILM BOX
SLIDING DOOR. UP AND DOWN CAN'T BE LEFT OPEN OBSERVATION PORTS COVERED WITH GLASS OR MICA

I would have to be convinced of the practicability of this proposition by a very strenuous test, neighbor Carlson. To my way of thinking, the trouble would be that long before a reel of film was burned the heat would be so intense that the magazine or the film box would be destroyed. You see, you simply have a miniature stove, and the draught that those pipes would create would make a very fierce fire—sufficiently so, I should suppose, to destroy both pipe and magazine.

Short Throw.

Mr. D. A. McDonald, Fernie, B. C., contributes the following:

> I have a Simplex projector and am having trouble with it. Had a very decided travel ghost, both top and bottom. It could not be removed by shutter adjustment. Made a new three-wing shutter, with the main wing a quarter inch wider, and this fixed the ghost business. I project a 14-foot 6-inch picture on a 36-foot throw, using a 2¼-inch M. P. lens. I find it very difficult to get a good light. When I pull 35 to 40 amperes the carbons must be separated about one-quarter of an inch, or else they sputter and it is impossible to hold the arc. The holders are for ⅝ carbons. I use ¾ cored carbons, rasped down to fit holder, and find a little improvement. When I reduce to 28 and 30 amperes the light is very yellow, but I must be content with it or else use the cored carbons top and bottom. With the latter method I get plenty of flaming and the upper carbon needles way back. Current is 110 volts d. c., through a Power's adjustable rheostat. I also have much trouble with losing the lower loop. This happens on practically every film. The lower idler is not too tight and the take-up is only moderately so. Had trouble with the fire shutter sticking on account of the metal swelling with the heat, but filing fixed that. The curtain is of plain cloth, and manager will not have it framed or painted, as this also is a road show house; consequently he is afraid of its being destroyed. Will you please give me your opinion as to the light, the screen and what size condensers I should use?

As to the light, I am unable to say what is wrong; ⅝ cored carbon above and half-inch cored below ought handle 40 amperes without needling. I really do not know what to make of your trouble, unless your carbons are not good. I think I will turn that part of it over to the department fans and see what they can make of it. You should have two 6½-inch condensers. The thing to do, however, is get a longer throw if you can. It is exceedingly difficult to project a good 14-foot picture at 35 feet. Your manager will do well to outline the screen in black, as described on page 338 of the handbook. Inasmuch as the traveling show end is and must be a secondary consideration, your manager should give the excellence of his motion pictures precedence. If cloth is used the screen should be of a good grade of bleached muslin, such as is used for bed sheeting. As to the lower loop, do not have your take-up tension any tighter than is absolutely necessary to rewind all the film. Be sure the lower magazine is exactly in line, so that the film goes down into it straight and true; though, unless I am in error, the Simplex lower magazine is so made that you cannot get it out of line.

A Gas Outfit.

Mr. Charles Breuning, Nowata, Okla., writes:

> I have long been a lover and reader of the Moving Picture World and have many times benefited through its Projection Department. I have read with much interest the troubles and ups and downs of some of the operators and managers, but never imagined I could assist anyone until now. I feel, however, that I can be of benefit to Mr. McClelland, Kellaher, Sask., Canada. I had the same trouble he is up against, together with a lot of squealing, sputtering and spitting. In taking the valves apart I found the rubber gaskets had been eaten by the oxzone and ether. The oxzone is much worse than lye, and ether will dissolve rubber. I got some ordinary gasket rubber, took the valves apart, one at a time, so as not to get the parts of two valves mixed, as they are very much alike. I laid the ring or washer on the rubber and marked the screw holes and around the outside and inside of the ring. I then cut out the pattern thus made and had a rubber washer or gasket. I then repeated the operation, except as to cutting out the center. This gave me a round piece of rubber instead of a washer. I then laid the old round piece of rubber in on the new and marked the center hole and punched the holes with a small harness punch. I put them together and they work fine. Now one can of oxzone and one half can of ether runs 1 hour and 20 minutes, giving good results. I have been in some pretty tight places in the operating room when handling the juice, but held myself together pretty well until I mastered it, but when I tackled a gas-making outfit I had an awful time for a while.

On behalf of brother McClelland and other gas users, I wish to thank you for your excellent description of your method of making the gaskets for gas outfit. It will no doubt assist your brother gas users very

Two Machines From One Rectifier.

Hall Brothers, Victor, Colo., write:

> We have been constant readers of the department almost since its inception. Have both your old and new handbooks and could not get along without them. We want a little information, as follows: Our current is 30 cycle and we have a mercury arc rectifier. The question is, can we operate both machines with one rectifier, or will it be absolutely necessary to have a separate rectifier for each machine? Lead No. 6 from the main reactance heats. We asked the General Electric Company why, and they say they do not know. Do the Edison people make carbon jaws for a larger carbon than ⅝, so that where different sizes are used above and below the same will line up? Have written them, but received no reply.

You can use two machines with one rectifier, but it will be very awkward, since only one lamp must be burned at a time, thus prohibiting the burning of craters on a new carbon set. All you have to do is install a double throw switch, connecting the d. c. lines from the rectifier to the center poles, and one of the lamps to either end. As to the Edison carbon clamps, I do not know. You can, however, provided the clamps are large enough to take the carbons you want to use, and ⅝ is large enough for any current delivered by rectifier, insert a metal bushing in the lower arm to make up the difference in diameter between the ⅝ and half-inch carbons. As to lead No. 6 heating, I cannot offer you definite information, but it may be a defective wire. I would suggest that you remove that particular wire and substitute a new one of the same size, or a little larger. It may be that a mistake has been made and a small wire put in. Substituting a larger wire will do no harm in any event.

Projection by Sunlight.

Mr. C. R. Stewart, Indianapolis, Ind., orders a Handbook, and says:

> I am ex-operator and manager, though I have not been in the business for a long time. I am still a picture fan, however, and like to keep up with the game. Here is a little stunt, which might be of interest to some of the boys: I have an old No. 4 Optigraph which I fixed up for home use. I removed the lamphouse and in its place have a square piece of iron, holding a 4½ inch reading glass which takes the place of condensers. Further back, I arranged a looking-glass to reflect the sunlight. With this outfit, I can project a nine foot picture and get as good results, on a bright day, as with calcium. I use a canvas screen filled with whiting and to which a little blue has been added.

Yes, brother, but, keeping in view the fact that the position of the sun is constantly changing, how do you manage to have the rays reflected right all the time? That is, to me, the interesting point.

"Advantage" of Short Throw.

Des Moines, Iowa, orders a Handbook, and says:

> I am operating at the Royal, this city, using a Simplex, 35 amperes of 110 volts, d. c., projecting a 12 foot picture at 60 feet on a Mirroroide screen. I get an excellent picture, which is probably not so much due to exceptional operating ability as to the advantage I have in a short throw, a small picture and a good screen, to say nothing of d. c. Would like to know why some films go through machines without any noise, while others make an awful clatter. The Edison films, particularly, make an awful racket, especially the sub-titles, while other films go through without any noise at all.

You are in error, Des Moines, in supposing that a short throw is an advantage. It is a very decided disadvantage, unless the picture is very small indeed. I consider any throw requiring less than a four inch e. f. as undesirable. As to the other matter, I have received a good many complaints as to the perforations of the Edison films, and have written the Edison Company, but, up to date, have not received a reply. If other operators have met with this experience, I would be glad to hear from them in this connection. Let me say that I am receiving a great many kicks about carelessness in the printing of several makes of Independent films. I have written the Universal people and Mr. Laemmle has promised reforms. It is not the desire of this department to publish things of this kind, where the fault can be remedied without publication. But matters of this kind are of very great importance to the exhibitor and operator, and unless a remedy is promptly applied, I shall be compelled to name the offending companies. A word to the wise is, or ought to be, sufficient. The fault complained of consists of mis-frames, bad patches and occasional light or dark pictures, due to over or under exposure in printing. All these faults are chargeable directly to rank carelessness or crass stupidity on the part of employees. There is absolutely no possible excuse for such work and it should not be tolerated.

Normal College Installs Projector.

Mr. Geoffrey Jefferson, Ypsilanti, Mich., writes, ordering a Handbook, and says:

> It might be of interest to you to know that the Michigan Normal State College has installed two Power's Six A motor driven projectors, for the purpose of projecting educational films and the better class of dramas. I made a two-blade shutter which I am using instead of the three-blade that was on the machine. I believe, without any doubt, that we are giving a better picture than either one of the theaters down-town.

In the language of the Redoubtable Teddy: "Bully for you," friend Jefferson. The Ypsilanti (some name, that) theater operators had better wake up and get very busily busy. Shame upon you. I'm s'prised at you allowing a mere school to swipe the Ypsilanti (what does that bunch of letters stand for anyhow?) projection bun. Seriously, however, the college has made a very wise move. Up-to-date institutions of learning all over the world are recognizing the value of moving pictures as an adjunct to educational work and are installing modern projection apparatus.

Flicker Trouble.

North Yakima, Wash., writes as follows:

> Received the Handbook and will say that I would not be without it, though I have not as yet seen anything of the torch. I am using 60 cycle a. c., projecting a 12 ft. picture at 60 feet with a 5 inch e. f. projection lens, using one 6½ and one 7½ condenser. I have a two-wing shutter, but cannot run slower than 15 minutes to 1,000 feet of film. Tried a three-wing shutter, but the picture or light seemed to roll. I worked in another house a block away, using the same current and everything, but used a three-wing shutter and ran anywhere between 14 and 20 minutes without any trouble whatever. Why cannot I do so now? I like to make the movements of the actors and other things as natural as possible, but in order to do this I must have a greater range of speed.

Provided your statements are all correct, the trouble must lie in the screen. Very likely you used a cloth or plaster screen at the other house, and have some type of semi-reflecting screen where you now are. Do not know what you mean by light "rolling." With a three-wing shutter and 60 cycle current, the light flashes when you speed up between 70 and 80. By "flashing," I mean it dies down and flashes up, the same being due to synchronism of the shutter blades with one side of the alternations. You are right in wishing to "make the actors move naturally." That is the artistic part of operating.

One Hundred Per Cent. Organized.

Mr. W. P. Raoul, President L. U. 225, I. A. T. S. E., Atlanta, Ga., writes:

> In accepting your offer for space in the department for list of officers of the various locals, please accept the heartfelt thanks of the members of No. 225 for the benefits they have derived through your department. This union, though just a little more than a year old, is in excellent condition. We are practically 100 per cent. organized here in Atlanta. As to the projection, I do not think there is a city in the country that can boast of better pictures than can Atlanta.

My congratulations to L. U 225, Brother Raoul, on the fact that you are thoroughly organized and on the further fact that projection in Atlanta is on a high plane. I would recommend to your consideration the school plan adopted by the Salt Lake Union, described in the department recently. It is a good thing. Push it along! The list of officers is published at the head of the department.

Flicker Trouble.

Mr. W. A. Norman, Rockwell City, Iowa, is troubled with the following:

> Will you please suggest some remedy by means of which I can eliminate the excessive flicker in my picture? Am using 40 amperes of 60 cycle a. c., through a compensarc, 70-foot throw and a Power's Six machine, gold fibre screen. I formerly used the three-wing shutter, but it was not satisfactory with a. c. With the two-winger, I get a good picture, but there is a great deal of flicker.

There is nothing to be suggested in this connection, neighbor Norman. On pages 219 and 223, inclusive, of the Handbook, you will find a complete explanation of the shutter principle and the why and wherefore of flicker. You could reduce the flicker by using a plain cloth or plaster screen, but so long as you use a semi-reflecting screen, there will be considerable flicker when using a two-wing shutter. Neighbor Norman enclosed a stamp for reply by mail. Replies by mail are only made where a minimum fee of $1.00 is enclosed.

School Installation.

Mr. Ellison Aker, Lima, Ohio, writes:

> Thought I would write a few lines to tell you about a moving picture outfit which has been installed in the St. Rose Catholic School, this city, by the Rev. W. A. Tobin. The equipment consists of a Motiograph Special Massachusetts Model machine and a Fort Wayne Compensarc, which we use on the 60 ampere notch. Our operating room is 8 x 6 x 8 feet, and has automatic fire doors and everything else which the fire rules require. Our throw from lens to curtain is 56 feet and I use two 7½ condensers., At present we show four reels every Sunday afternoon and evening, using Independent service. I think it would be a good idea if the manufacturers of the Motiograph would so place the screws with which you tighten the framer that it could be tightened by reaching through the side of the machine instead of having to take off the front plate to do so. Also in converting the machine into a Massachusetts Model they covered up the small oil hole through which you oil the shutters and the machine had been running for some time before I noticed it was there and then only because I had to take off the front of the machine to tighten the framer. I use vaseline on the gears and in the star and cam case as it is a good lubricant and doesn't fly around much. I use the kind that comes in tubes and not the carholated stuff as that contains too much kerosene to make it a good lubricant. Regarding our curtain, we use a canvas one covered with Calcimo, to which a small quantity of bluing was added so that it would take away the dead white glare. Although I know that you have no patience with young fellows in the operating room I must tell you that I am sixteen years of age and a member of the graduating class of the St. Rose High School.

My only reason for objecting to youth in the operating rooms is the fact that very young men are usually unreliable and, moreover, they have not the matured judgment and steadiness which comes only with the years. In a school installation where the work is confined to running at the most a few reels a day, a bright lad of sixteen might, provided he had some experience, produce very good results indeed; particularly a high-school boy who has the advantage of considerable mental training. Evidently, from the letter friend Aker writes, he comes in this class, since it is one of the few letters printed practically as it is written. As to your criticisms of certain features of the Motiograph projector, they are referred to the manufacturer for consideration.

The Right Spirit.

Mr. L. A. Woodward, Manager, Enterprise Optical Co., Chicago, writes:

> In the March 15th issue we note with considerable interest your criticism of the Motiograph arc lamp in 1913 model machines, and can assure you of our appreciation of your fair and just remarks concerning the lamp; also that they will have our attention. We are frank to admit that the criticisms are excellent and the suggestions good ones. The upper carbon arm bearing is now being changed so that the weight of the upper carbon arm will be materially lightened, and the present gearing simplified, and at the same time, we are taking care of the purpose for which the change is intended, viz.: to hold the arm more rigidly. Your suggestion for the increase in size of rack bars, we do not consider necessary for the reason that there is already sufficient rigidity in the rack bar itself, whereas increasing the length of the rack body casting, as you suggest, would undoubtedly make the lamp more rigid, but it would mean we would have to enlarge our present lamphouse and raise the sliding ways for the lamp. However, we do not say that we will not do this, as your suggestions have been kindly received and we will probably adopt them in the near future.

At the risk of offending Brother Woodward, I have published this letter, though I presume he meant it to be a personal one. I have done this to show that some manufacturers, at least, are broad-minded enough to accept criticism in the right spirit. It is distinctly to the credit of the Enterprise Optical Company that its general manager can recognize faults in his own product when they are pointed out to him, and, moreover, is willing to eliminate them. As to the rack bars, they are plenty rigid enough; true, but the point is that it is never possible to have a rack bar perfectly tight in its bearing. Now you can move the outer end of a carbon arm which is attached to a rack bar one-half inch square sidewise a great deal more than you could were it attached to a rack bar a quarter or a half-inch thick by one inch wide. Do you see the point, Brother Woodward? I wish to say again, lest those who might not have read my former criticism may misunderstand, that the same only applies to minor defects in the lamp, which is, as a whole, an excellent and well designed piece of mechanism.

A Letter From Russia.

> I wonder whether you have ever yet received a letter from this little known and generally grossly maligned country? Perhaps not, as I believe that this is the only office receiving your paper regularly; few others would understand a word of it anyhow, not being able to read or speak English. My work here has been that of opening a new branch office for the well known London firm of M. P. Sales Agency, Limited, about whom I often notice mention in your columns. Particularly interesting are those that come all the way from China, as I was personally responsible for that branch of the business when last in London. Just to give you a rough idea of the interest I find for your real "live" paper, let me call your attention to the misprint in the "Simplex" advertisement, page 690, Feb. 15th issue, also to the word "Cam," which your proofreader has allowed to go through as "Can," in the Lavezzi advertisement, page 711. I think this will be enough to show you how little I miss when I get The World, and I want to say further that the projection department news always interests me most, barring the stuff about the various unions, etc., which I have no doubt is most valuable to your own operators, but which we, the far-away "foreign devils," generally skip as being altogether too local. You will, no doubt, be pretty well posted on the conditions of things in this country but, in case it still interests you, let me give you the following facts: There are about 800 to 1,000 theaters here, the very largest only seating about 200 to 300 and are nearly always on the second floor, as you call it over there, but the first floor as we call it in England. As yet, there are no theaters here that can boast of having two machines, the nearest approach to this being two separate halls on the same floor with a separate machine for each. Half the program is shown in one hall and the audience then saunters into the other for the remainder!!!!! The projection is invariably bad and there is only one show in the whole of this city of over a million inhabitants that transforms its current from the city three-phase to direct current for the projection arc lamp. Can you expect good pictures under these conditions? All the same we see the newest and best American and European films here, and it is noteworthy that the audiences are of a class far above any in the greater part of the rest of Europe. I have often seen high officials in uniform sitting in the local theaters and I certainly cannot say that of Germany or France. The prices charged for admission are high and there are always little open "boxes" at the back of the stalls, each of which holds from four to six chairs and costs five roubles ($2.50) the lot. Please excuse bad typewriting as I am no expert at this part of the work, and you people over there are spoiled anyhow as regards printing and office cleanliness. What would you say if your office-boy, who, like most of his class here is but a poor ablutionist in summer and misses those duties entirely in winter, were to utilize the passage just outside your private office door as a sleeping room. And, mind you, this is no exceptional case. Is is almost always so. By the time you get this I shall be in dear old London again and right gladly will I look forward to a wee line of acknowledgment from you if you have found me interesting.

I am very sure that Brother Bluman's letter will be of much interest to our readers. It is to be regretted that projection has not attained a higher plane in the land of the Czar. Let us hope for better things in the future. Seems to me there would be a splendid opening for some enterprising Americans in the larger cities of Russia, if they would open first class houses, take a few real operators with them, and put on high class projection. Brother Bluman gave no London address, therefore I cannot acknowledge his letter by mail.

The First Time.

Mr. C. Everett Wagner, Thomasville, N. C., writes:

> I believe I am lucky, for in all my six years' experience this is the first time I have had to call on you or anyone else for help. This is not because I know it all," but I have been taking The Moving Picture World nearly six years, and the last three of them I have studied the projection department closely. I do not really see how any operator can get along without your advice as given through the projection department. If they would study what you write closely, and refer to back numbers, they would not have occasion to ask so many questions. My own trouble may have been treated in some of the back numbers, but if so, I cannot find it, and my goat is "got" bad. I have an Edison Type B projector and my picture jumps up and down on the screen just like it does when you speed up to about 95. I seldom run over 60 and film jumps, the Vitagraph much worse than others. I have put on new tension springs and aperture plate and have properly adjusted them, but it did no good. The machine is nearly new; nothing worn to give any play at all. My manager is different from the ordinary run of employers. When we have an extra good night, he comes up in the operating room and slips me half a dollar, or sometimes a dollar. That is extra, and I get a good salary, too. If there is any extra good service in an operator, this method will certainly bring it out. If managers would try that scheme, they might discover that it would return wonderfully good interest on the investment. Our film service is thirty days' old.

In describing troubles of this kind you should be very careful and circumstantial in describing the effect produced. If the jump is rhythmical, occurring four times to each turn of the crank, then it is due to one of two things, viz.: (a) The intermittent sprocket not round. (b) The intermittent sprocket shaft sprung. If the jump does not occur that way, then you will have to describe it more closely than you have. As to the extra pay, that is a mighty good plan and certainly would have the effect of putting the operator on his mettle. It would do more than anything else to secure the hearty co-operation of the operator, I think. It is well worth trying. Is the face of your intermittent sprocket clean? Dirt on the face of intermittent sprocket will cause the picture to jump.

Change in Mercury Arc Rectifier Sales Arrangements.

This department is in receipt of a letter from Mr. H. C. Nelson, Sales Department, General Electric Co., calling our attention to the fact that the price of their mercury arc rectifier has been reduced. The retail price of the rectifier is now $247.50 and $198.50, according to the kind purchased. In view of the reduction, the guaranteed life of the tubes has been reduced to 300 hours. This is what Mr. Nelson says in this connection: "A life of three hundred (300) hours may be guaranteed on each multiple rectifier tube. Should the life of any tube fall below three hundred hours, adjustment may be made with the original purchaser, or, at his option, direct with the producer, on a pro rata basis, according to the ultimate purchase price of the tube."

Mr. Nelson has taken the proper course in notifying the department of this change. Formerly, the tubes were guaranteed for five hundred (500) hours. As it now stands, the purchaser may demand and receive a guarantee for three hundred (300) hours, and should the tube fail in less time, a proportionate reduction will be made on the price of the new one.

Nothing Doing.

Brooklyn, N. Y., writes:

> I was one time a licensed operator in New York City, but allowed the license to expire. For the past few years, I have been located in Ithaca, N. Y., and when I came back to New York City had to undergo a new examination. I fell down on the following: (a) The operation of an economizer and the meaning of induction or induced current. (b) How I would hook up for a one night show where no provision is made for moving picture connection, and all that can be found is a pair of 250,000 circular mill cables running through a small, say 6 by 6-inch iron box. (c) How to look and where to look for trouble in case the fuses in operating room blow as fast as they are put in place. Will you kindly answer the above in the next issue of the World?

I will not. It is not the purpose of this department to coach operators so that they can pass an examination, but it is its purpose to offer general instruction. A diligent study of the Handbook will enable you to thoroughly understand everything involved in question (a), as well as, I think, equip you with knowledge sufficient to answer questions (b) and (c). You can secure that book at the office of the Moving Picture World, or it will be sent you, postpaid, by mail on receipt of the price, $2.50. It will not "tell you the answers," but will supply knowledge which ought to enable you to form correct answers of your own.

Worn Out Machine.

Middle West writes:

> The new handbook contains more genuine knowledge in a small space than I supposed any person could get there. The electrical part of that book is the finest ever. I have a 1909 Motiograph, projecting a 15-foot picture. The mechanism is sadly in need of repairs. There is about ⅛ inch play in the shutters, and maybe you think I don't have a gay time setting them. We get the independent 10 to 20-day service, in fine condition. The only way I could get my machine in running condition was to buy the repairs myself, and I had been contributing about $1 a week to that end.

As for buying repairs for your machine, I would not do anything of the kind. The manager who will get high class film service and expect the operator to produce results with an old, worn-out, out-of-date, decrepit projector has mistaken his calling. He might make an excellent boot and shoe merchant, or possibly would excel as a raiser of superior alfalfa, but as a theater manager he is a joke.

"Let Well Enough Alone" Advice.

Jewel City, Kas., says he is using cored carbons on a.c., through a 30-40-50 ampere transformer, and has an old Edison model. He says that the old operator told him that that was good enough, and to let well enough alone, but he says he is after the best.

There are places where the "let well enough alone" idea is all right, but not when it comes to the matter of theater equipment. Jewel City should use ⅝ cored carbons top and bottom, as illustrated and directed under the heading, "Setting the Carbons," page 204 of the handbook, which I would by all means advise Jewel City to procure at once. If you have an old style Edison projector you should procure a new machine. Presumably you mean an Exhibition model, and that particular machine is far behind the times. Keep up to date with your projection machine equipment, Jewel City, is my advice.

Comments on the Films

Licensed

"THE SACRIFICE" (Kalem), April 2.—A picture that doesn't get over strongly; chiefly because the scenario was not planned with the effect desired closely enough in mind. There is a long and not significant statement before we really get down to the situation, when the old farmer and his wife give their home to save their daughter's husband's business. She had married a rich broker. Carlyle Blackwell and Elsie Greeson have the leads. The photography is only fair, but there are one or two pretty scenes.

"CHINESE TEMPLES" (Selig), April 2.—A short offering on the same reel with the above. There is much of interest in it and it is prettily photographed.

"THE FLOODED DISTRICTS" (Lubin), April 2.—This terrible picture of the recent disastrous floods at Dayton and Hamilton, Ohio, gives us a clear idea of what has happened there. It is well photographed.

"ALIXE" (Vitagraph), April 2.—Eugene Mullin, the author of this picture, has given, as a secondary title, "Or the Test of Friendship," but the eye of the spectator never leaves the story's center of interest, the woman. The plot is skillfully planned to keep it there, and there it would have been, even though Helen Gardner had not been cast in the leading role. The friend is played for the sake of the impression as a whole by Earle Williams and so on account of his artistic virtue will not be noticed. In her role, Miss Gardner makes one of her big characterizations. What art she has! She holds back, like a skillful runner, till the end, where an emotional breakdown was needed, and walks from the scene, the very picture of rebellion comforted by love and breaking into tears. But this would be little if it were all. Her intellect plainly sees much between the lines of the scenario and she coldly goes about expressing it, as one who aims at a target. When the picture was made, she didn't always succeed in hiding her method and, instead of seeming cool, seemed cold at times, once in a while, even mechanical. Harry Morey and Harry Northrup have roles. The picture was produced by W. V. Ranous. The photography is flat, but clear enough. It makes a very desirable offering.

"THE DUKE'S DILEMMA" (Edison), April 2.—A light farce comedy that will find human echoes in many hearts. We found much of it most amusing; but heard little or no laughter from the audience. The poor duke (Marc MacDermott), needed to make a showing, so gets some strolling players to be his court of ceremony. The tragedian (Charles Ogle), makes a comical Malvolio-like majordomo. Mable Trunnelle has an important role. The whole cast is strong. The script is by P. Herbert and it was produced by Walter Edwin. We feel sure that is a safe offering and in many places will be a star number.

"THE ENGINEER'S DAUGHTER" (Patheplay), April 2. — A picture melodrama that is entirely for the sake of action. It makes a very good offering, although it might have been even more thrilling, if more time had been taken with the scenario. As it is it holds well and pleased the audience. Photography is fair.

"CAIRO, EGYPT, AND ITS ENVIRONS" (Pathe), April 2.—A short offering on the same reel. It is interesting, but is poorly photographed.

"THE PRICE OF GOLD" (Essanay), April 2.—A simple, wholesome situation which, in its development, contrasts the happy lot of a village girl dreaming of riches with the cold and empty life that becomes hers after she marries wealth. It is an effective picture and it makes a good offering, one that will be widely popular. It won the audience with whom we saw it. Dorothy Phillips plays well both the simple girl and the rich society matron and her ease and naturalness make the picture convincing. She is supported by a good cast; Frank Dayton as her husband; Dolores Cassinelli, her married sister, and E. H. Calvert, her humble sweetheart. Bryant Washburn plays her sister's husband. The sets, especially the dining-room and the library in the city house, are admirable. The photography is of good quality in most of the scenes, though a bit shadowy in some.

"A LUCKY MISTAKE" (Selig), April 2.—The story is merely a simple anecdote, but the picture makes a good offering. This is mostly because it is clearly told, is pleasing in itself, is acted naturally and is photographed perfectly. One of the best things about it, to our mind, is the fact that there is no straining after something big and dramatic; it is content to be human and the pleasure of the spectators justifies its freedom from ambition, of which, unjustified, we see too much. George F. Worts is the author and it was produced by Lorimer Johnstone. Pretty Adrienne Kroell is the daughter of the Cranston chief of police (T. J. Commerford), and loses her purse in Alden. A telegram from her father to the Alden chief, Charles Clary, changes a word and results in her being arrested, which ends in her finding her purse. It is a pretty amusing offering.

"ARABIA, THE EQUINE DETECTIVE" (Selig), April 3.—Arabia, the intelligent horse that does the detective work and saves the hero from paying for the villian's crime, is a beautiful animal and it is very interesting to see him in the picture. In the picture are many pretty girls, whom also, it is pleasant to look upon. Apart from the tricks of the horse, there is no story in any real sense of the term; but a series of scenes clearly photographed that give disjointed entertainment and keep the offering from being a failure. The photography is clear.

"A FALSE FRIEND" (Lubin), April 3.—A melodrama somewhat better than the usual run. It deals with the rough doings of rough people in the West and gets its measure of strength from the natural way it is acted, more than from its story. For, by melodramatic license, this is not subservient to the truth of life—at least not at its climaxes. The heroine is personable and the piteous Indian mother excites our sympathy and this also helps a good deal. The photography is clear. As an offering to the public, it will be popular; there were some near us whose attention was held very strongly by it. The author and producer is Wilbert Melville. Carl von Schiller is the hero; Henry King, the villain; Dorothy Davenport, the heroine; and Irene Hunt, the Indian woman.

"THERE SHE GOES" (Patheplay), April 3.—Here is a queer character-farce for laughter. It ought to cheer up any audience even on a rainy evening. The house we saw it in was full of sound, like a brook on a sunny day, and, as for ourselves, we thoroughly enjoyed it. Gwendolyn Pates plays the daughter of Hans (Charles Arling), the village grocer who doesn't want her to marry Jim (W. A. Williams). There is no use in telling the story of a farce; suffice that every inch of it is funny. The players deserve great credit.

"THE MIDGET'S ROMANCE" (Vitagraph), April 3.—The value of this offering comes wholly from the presence in it of Lord Robert, a true midget. To see the little man living his daily life is more amusing than to see his love-making. It is clearly photographed and makes a commendable offering. It took pretty well with the audience here.

"THE WILL-BE WEDS" (Essanay), April 3.—There is a fresh and piquant situation in this farce and, though to the critic it seems "nursed" a bit, the audience found it very amusing. The fine acting, especially of John Steppling, does much to keep it from dragging and, perhaps, to the majority, will make it real and convincing. Dad (Joseph Allen), reaches the run-away lovers at the parsonage. The minister is not at home; his butler puts on his master's coat, and Dad, thinking the couple married, gives his blessing. The young couple said they were married and now they are in a fix, for they can't shake Dad who orders the spare room made ready. Beverly Bayne is the girl. A good deal has been made of it and it is commendable as an offering. The photography is clear.

"THE HERO OF LITTLE ITALY" (Biograph), April 3.—There is a good story in this picture and the producer has made it exciting. As it approaches its climax, the scenes, flashed back and forth, keep the action concrete and almost breathless. But this playing for the thrill is not the best use of the motion picture camera; for in such there is almost no individual acting—every thing goes to situation, nothing to character. It justifies itself at the box office; but so does the higher kind; the first has a more immediate, the second a more lasting effect. Blanche Sweet, Kate Toncray, Charles West, Harry Carey, Charles Mailes, W. J. Butler and many others have roles with plenty to do. The photography is not quite up to Biograph standard. It is an excellent offering.

"THE STOLEN TRIBUTE TO THE KING" (Melies), April 3.—A story of Tahiti that is as straightforward and as simple as the people from whose annals it was taken. It is child-like without being childish and makes a strong appeal to the naturalness that civilization has still left in us; such pictures strongly appeal to the majority. The audience plainly liked it. We wish the photography were clearer, but it is good enough to get the story over. It opens with a fine glimpse of the surf.

"THE RIVER WANGANUI" (Melies), April 3.—On the same reel is this scenic, taken from a motor boat steaming up a narrow torrent-like stream, among the hills of New Zealand. At its end, there is a view of tumbling waters that is fine. The photography is good, much better than in the first half of the reel.

"NOBILITY" (Patheplay), April 2.—This is truly a feature picture; it is in three parts, is hand-colored and, in all that might be grouped under staging, seems as nearly perfect as possible. The leading woman is strikingly lovely, more beautiful than usual, even in Patheplays, while all the players are intelligent and natural. There are times when the acting rises pretty high and it puts substance into the story, which is not quite worthy of the fine presentation that was given it, although it is interesting. The first two reels hold strongly; but at the opening of the third reel, we find a duke's sister, who has married a count, making a surreptitious visit on a banker at his house, merely because he had written to her that her husband was ruining himself and suggesting that she call. Then the duke's newly-wed wife, disliked by the mother-in-law, a finely drawn marchioness, does an over-noble action in saving her sister-in-law. It holds strongly, but doesn't move us deeply. The photography is perfect and the coloring very fine.

"THE GOLDEN HOARD" (Vitagraph), April 4.—"Or Buried Alive," is the second title attached to this picture of mystery and horror. A two reel, special subject, it makes a commendable feature offering and can be depended upon to thrill the spine of any normal audience. The story is off the beaten track and therefore cuts with a sharp edge. The hero, who is buried alive, once belonged to a gang of cutthroats from whom he fled. Later, in delirium, he reveals the whereabouts of a box of treasure he had helped bury. When well, he knows nothing of having given the secret away, nor that his new friend has secured it, nor does he know why, after they go into partnership, they get rich so quickly. The partner on his death bed tells him all. He tries, in fear, to put the gold back, but finds that it is too late. The gang has come and found the treasure gone and has vowed vengeance against him. From this point on the picture can truthfully be called "gripping." We heard a spectator near us say, "isn't it terrible." The ending will be popular and it makes a good impression as a whole, for it is well acted and clearly developed. There is one scene that, in pictures like this, never gets over strongly—it is that in which the hero sees a face at the window (Indian-in-a-Western, outlaw-in-a-mountain picture, and in this picture the pirate), and willfully frightens his wife by his account of it. The photography is clear enough, but has not much quality.

"THE BURDEN BEARER" (Lubin), April 4.—Emmet Campbell Hall has written a strong story. Produced by Arthur Johnson, its strength has been added to. Mr. Johnson also plays the lead, and his work has never been better than it is today. The picture has been splendidly staged. There are five characters in the play, and all are worthy of praise. Vivian Pates has the role of Agnes, with whom two brothers are in love; Howard Mitchell is not only the favored son, but also the one loved by Agnes; Clara Lambert is the mother of the two sons; Florence Hackett has the difficult part of an adventuress, who at first lures the favored son, Dudley, and later falls in love with Robert (Mr. Johnson), a naval officer on leave. Miss Hackett's work will make strong appeal to men of the world—and also to worldly-wise women. Especially is this true of the last scenes, where Robert casts her off and tells her that he won her regard only to lure her from his brother, who had already supplanted him in the affections of Agnes. There will be many who see this picture who will regret that the adventuress did not win out, and that there should have been no occasion for the set expression on the face of the naval officer as he paced the ship's deck after he returned to duty.

"A WOLF AMONG LAMBS" (Essanay), April 4.—Bryant Washburn has the role of a libertine in a play that is not pleasant, although impressively put on. Helen Dunbar as Sister Valencia, a nun who protects two sisters, the first of whom fell and the second is pursued by Don Fernando, gives a fine portrayal.

"THE INVENTOR'S SKETCH" (Edison), April 4.—Here's a story without a woman in it. G. T. Evans, the author, is to be commended for his courage in writing it and the Edison Company for accepting it. It is altogether too common a superstition or belief that a scenario must carry a love story or it won't get through. Little Yale Boss, as Billy, the office boy, does a fine bit of acting. Standing out is his work when, just after being taken from the safe where he had been locked up, he simulates slowly returning consciousness. Bigelow Cooper, Richard Neill and William West are the others in the cast. George Lessey has produced a good picture.

"WHIFFLES" (Patheplay), April 4.—Farce comedy, essentially French in execution. There are some good laughs in it.

"AN EXCURSION TO THE GRANDE CHARTREUSE, FRANCE" (Patheplay), April 4.—On the same reel as the foregoing is this fine scenic. The man who selected the backgrounds was an artist.

"THE HOYDEN'S AWAKENING" (Selig), April 4.—Comedy drama, interesting at times, also at times—to this writer, at least—not quite clear. The director selected good backgrounds.

"FATTY'S DECEPTION" (Kalem), April 4.—Ruth Roland offers to marry the winner of a ten-mile foot race between John Brennan and Marshal Neilan. They'll pull laughter out of any kind of a house.

"NEW YORK PUBLIC MARKETS" (Kalem), April 4.—On the same reel is a series of pictures showing how New Yorkers are supplied with food.

"LET 'EM QUARREL" (Vitagraph), April 4.—Larry Trimble puts on a delightful comedy, the script of which is written by M. T. Jacobs. Miss Turner and Tom Powers have the roles of married persons who will quarrel. There are good situations; for getting out of these the limit of possibilities, leave it to Miss Turner. Her facial control is shown here at its best—lightning-like changes from laughter to sterness, from affection, when the husband isn't looking, to coldness when he turns his head. In theatrical parlance, the orchestra may enjoy the picture more than the gallery; but the latter will like it.

"THE PERFIDY OF MARY" (Biograph), April 5.—There is a good deal of prettiness about this picture and the story is cleverly set forth. The offering will be liked; yet, from an artistic standpoint, it is not wholly a success. What Mary (Mae Marsh) does seems to be perfidy, but its purpose is to protect her cousin from a Lothario who is treated in a way that will please the audience. Dorothy Gish plays the cousin. Walter Miller plays the bashful lover. Lionel Barrymore plays the objecting father of Mae. The photography is fair. The story is artistically told; but the picture seems crowded by its unimportant incidents.

"MODERN PROGRESS IN SOMALILAND, EAST AFRICA" (Cines), April 5.—There is much to interest in this picture of Italy's African domain. It gives us some views along the Nebi river, including some hand-colored sunset pictures that are worthy.

"FAINT HEART NE'ER WON FAIR LADY" (Cines), April 5.—On the same reel is this clearly played farce comedy. If there is not much "punch" in it, it is better entertainment than much of what passes for punch. It seemed to amuse the audience, too. The photography, which is fair, might have been better, especially as its scenes are very pretty.

"THE BROKEN IDYLL" (Patheplay), April 5.—While there is not much that is deeply interesting in the situation of this picture, it is pleasingly developed and makes a very fair offering. Set on a ranch, it has some good pictures of animals, also some sensational riding and some charming scenes. The photography is clear.

"A MISSISSIPPI TRAGEDY" (Kalem), April 5.—There is a good deal of freshness in this story of gambling for high stakes on Mississippi steamboats in days before the war. The really good point about it is that it seems realistically true to the times it pictures, and so it convinces. It has, for instance, a real back-kicking steamer of the old type. The scenes with this in are fine. The plot, with new incidents, is conventional and ends, as many pictures do, with the heroine riding to save the hero, a noble-hearted young man who had been forbidden the house by her father, because he was a gambler. Anna Nilson is the girl; James Vincent, the hero; Hal Clements, the villain; Guy Coombs, the girl's brother and Henry Hallem, a fine old man, her father. The photography is clear. An offering that will be welcomed.

"MASTER AND MAN" (Edison), April 5.—We cannot place where we saw this picture before, though we remember it, as far as the outline goes, distinctly. There have been a number of pictures like it, but none that we have seen within a year. It was produced by L. S. Dawley. Sidney Ayres plays a young man who is rich and drinking too much. Charles Sutton plays an ex-convict whom he finds stealing his silver and persuades to reform and take service with him. Jessie McAllister plays the girl he marries. She gambles, gets into debt and steals from one of her guests. To save the "master," the old "man" takes the blame. It is not a very effective offering, although it is well set. The photography is not clear-cut and is often flat.

"HE ANSWERED THE AD" (Vitagraph), April 5.—A Bunny-Finch picture that is slow at first, but becomes a scream in the ending scenes, in which we find Bunny as a dancing girl in the chorus of a burlesque show. It is well photographed and the ending surely tickled the audience.

"BRONCHO BILLY'S WAY" (Essanay), April 5.—A new story that is dramatic and has a punch; but, although it is wholesome in its significance, being quite free from sentimentality, we don't dare call it a pleasant story. It is very effectively built and the acting carries it forward smoothly and clearly. The photography is fair in most of the scenes. It has a "punch."

"COLLECTING THE BILL" (Lubin), April 5.—This little farce kept the audience in a roar of laughter. It has a good amusing situation and good comic acting. It is the kind of picture to make the audience forget its troubles. Jack Ridgway has in his office Marguerite DeMoyer and two clerks, Walter Stull and George Reehm. He has a bill against Robert Burns, who goes into a rage whenever asked to pay. Each of the men tries to collect. We are shown what happens and see the hapless ones come back to the office needing bandages. The girl volunteers and tries gentler methods with success. That is all, but it is done in a very clever way and both author, E. W. Sargent, and producer, Arthur Hotaling, deserve praise.

"HIS WIDOW" (Lubin), April 5.—On the same reel is this farce by the same author and producer; but of not quite the same quality, being less spontaneous. It made a good deal of laughter. The acting is very commendable. Walter Stull hears that his godfather (Robert Burns) is coming to visit him. To escape he gets his landlady (Mae Hotely) to say she is his widow. Frances DeMoyer plays Walter's sweetheart, and George Reehm and Jack Ridgway play policemen.

"A CHANGE OF ADMINISTRATION" (Selig), April 5.—These two reels will interest throughout. They will do so in spite of the fact that there is no spectacular feature to raise this above the ordinary, although exception perhaps should be made to the short scene of the inaugural ball, which evidenced much care and expense in staging. The story is of a chief clerk of the War Department at Washington, in love with the daughter of the Mexican Ambassador. In spite of the fact that the clerk is morally certain to be without a position in less than a week by reason of the incoming administration naturally instituting changes, he proposes to the girl and is accepted. When he is notified that his job will go to another the fiancee proceeds to bribe his successor, and the first day in office of the latter is his last. The old chief clerk is reinstated for the four years. The story is not always logical; doubtless, also, it will be unpopular among the widely scattered servants of Uncle Sam. Charles Clary has the role of the old clerk and William Stowell that of the incoming official. Both do good work. Adrienne Kroell by her impersonation of the Ambassador's daughter will please her audiences. Hardee Kirkland produced the picture.

"THE QUEEN OF SPADES" (Cines), April 7.—This is a two reel, special picture and its first noticeable quality is the beauty of its scenes in which the prettiness of its leading lady, Lucille Hesperus, also an accomplished actress, plays an important part. Artistic in its staging, its story has been adroitly handled to make a popular appeal. So it makes a pretty effective offering, one that we can safely commend. The story is not great; but there is nothing in it that markedly detracts from its availability.

"THE WARDROBE LADY" (Essanay), April 8.—Good drama. The story is well told and well played. John Steppling and Beverly Bayne have the leads.

"THE EVIL ONE" (Lubin), April 7.—An unusual Indian story, with a fresh and dramatic situation rising from Indian superstition. The girl, played by Clara Williams, unhappily drinks from a jar of milk just before its owner finds that it is sour. It is assumed that she has "the evil eye," and the chief (Harry Loomes) calls upon the tribe to do away with her. Her lover (Edgar Jones) helps her to escape across the desert. One feels that more might have been made of this situation, but what we have makes an entertaining offering. The photography is only so-so; in some of the scenes it is poor. F. J. Grandon produced it from Wallace Clifton's script.

"VENGEANCE IS MINE" (Selig), April 7.—A Mexican, or perhaps Spanish, story of a hunchback painter. In the opening we find him a ragged waif, whom a friar is teaching to paint. He does the portrait of a beautiful girl, the sweetheart of a roue who sees him with the painting and throws the girl over. The painter adopts the daughter, when the girl dies, and twenty years pass. The grown daughter looks like the mother, and the roue, now an old man, comes upon her in a park and follows her to the painter's home, where he falls dead. The story is a good deal better than this outline, but there is all through the film a flatness that keeps it from interesting; it seems somewhat cheap. The acting, with the exception of the padre (Thomas Santschi) and the girl (Bessie Eyton), is not natural.

The photography lacks quality. Colin Campbell produced it from the script of Lanier Bartlet.

"BUNNY'S HONEYMOON" (Vitagraph). April 7.—A Bunnygraph that made a good deal of individual laughter, but only once or twice caught the whole audience. The plot seems forced, and this keeps most of it from that spontaneity needed for the best fun. There are one or two very funny incidents, and these a large audience appreciated. Bunny plays the godfather of Dorothy Kelly, who is engaged to Wallie Van, a good boy who, unfortunately, gets drunk. Bunny has him taken home, and then, with the help of some children, makes him think, on waking next day, that he has married a widow with a houseful of kids. It's a bad dream and cures him of his weakness. Charles Eldridge plays the girl's father. Frank Thomas is the author, and Wilfred North the producer. The photography is clear and effective.

"THE STOLEN BRIDE" (Biograph), April 7.—A melodramatic picture not quite up to the high standard of Biograph releases It gives no chance for human emotion, or real humor, or convincing suspense. Yet it makes a fair commercial offering, in that it keeps something alive on the screen, even though all that it uses is screen-worn. The photography is rather flat. The acting certainly wasn't bad, but acting has little chance in such a picture.

"PATHE'S WEEKLY," April 7.—The topical is rather thin in news value, but has a number of interesting items.

"A SHOWER OF SLIPPERS" (Edison), April 7.—A little farce of country village life, developing out of the minister's love story. There was some laughter, but the picture never seemed to catch the large audience as a whole, perhaps because there have been too many others that resemble it. The minister is played naturally and pleasingly by Bigelow Cooper, and Elsie McLeod is very sweet and engaging as the girl. Among the spinsters who also send slippers are Alice Washburn, Clara Adams, May Abbey and Florence Coventry. Mrs. Erskine plays the minister's sister. Arthur Housman plays the peddler, who gets the slippers from the minister's sister and tries to sell them in the village. Charles Seay produced it from E. A. Bull's script.

"IN THE GRIP OF A CHARLATAN" (Kalem), April 7.—A picture of modern life in a great city, in which hypnotism is used to bring out a melodramatic situation. It is not a great picture, but it is perhaps the most commendable offering, considering all things, among today's releases, and a large audience seemed to watch it closely. Alice Joyce is very pretty in the heroine's role as the one the charlatan (R. P. Gibbs) hypnotizes and makes a captive in his house. Tom Moore (the lover), with Richard Purdoo (the father) and police, rescue her. The sets are commendable, as usual in pictures made by this company. The photography is very good.

"OLD JIM" (Edison), April 8.—There is a dynamite blast in this picture which is intended to create suspense; it succeeds fairly well. The drama is of a drinking father of a young man in love with his employer's daughter. The quarry boss, seeing the father drunk, declines to accept the son as a suitor for his daughter. Later the old man reforms; in a blast he saves the little child of the boss, who has wandered into the danger zone.

"FOR HIS CHILD'S SAKE" (Lubin), April 8.—The same old triangle. The story is not pleasant, except it be the very finish. The burning of the cabin makes an effective bit of background.

"SCENES ALONG THE PESCARA RIVER" (Cines), April 8.—A scenic at times over-tinted. One interesting picture is of a tunnel driveway 132 feet long built 2,300 years ago.

"A ROMANCE BY THE SEA" (Cines), April 8.—On the same reel is this drama. The most that may be said for it is that it is a series of good backgrounds with a dialogue accompaniment; and very flat.

"THE TRANSITION" (Vitagraph), April 8.—Here is a good picture, embellished by good acting, the honors being divided between Charles Bennett, as a moonshiner; Mary Charleson, his daughter; and George C. Stanley, as the sheriff. Mr. Sturgeon is the producer.

"ROBERT HALE'S AMBITION" (Selig), April 8.—A story that will not stand analysis. A boy seeing the good times enjoyed during vacations by college chaps wants to go to college, too. His mother gives him $200—she works in a mill. On this money the boy has a big time; even wears a dress suit; also he attends cabaret shows—up in Vermont, at that. The production and the acting are creditable, but even these cannot put over this kind of a story.

Independent

"STEAM" (Kinemacolor).—Here is one of the best pictures the natural color company has made. It may be described as filmed standard fiction. The expenditure of much pains and money is apparent. The film portrays the lives first of James Watt as boy and man, and then of George Stephenson likewise. Watt is shown making his first discovery of the power of steam and constructing the model of the stationary engine. So also is shown George Stephenson as a boy, pushing a coal car over rails, and wondering why steam could not be employed to do the same thing. We see the making in clay of the first locomotive model and then the demonstration on rails of the first engine. Running through the pictures are portrayed the love stories of the two men, which raises the interest. Much attention is given to costumes of the period.

"MODELING EXTRAORDINARY" (Kinemacolor).—Trick photography, containing many new stunts. It will make much laughter. and will interest as well.

"FEATHERTOP" (Kinemacolor).—A good picture, adapted from the story of Nathaniel Hawthorne. Close attention is paid to the Colonial settings and costumes, which are convincing. It is well acted and produced.

"OUT OF THE DARKNESS" (Kinemacolor),—In this drama, filmed on the Pacific Coast and containing many fine backgrounds of old ocean, there is a real thrill—a punch. A husband, believing his wife to be in love with his brother, leaves on the beach his overcoat and a note that he has committed suicide and leaves the section. The wife loses her reason. Twice she sees her husband sitting in his favorite chair. When she embraces him her arms close on a shadow. The husband, reading of her affliction, returns home and consults her physician. The latter prepares a shock for the wife. He places the husband in the same chair. When the wife sees him she remembers the two failures. Then she touches his hand. She puts her arms about his neck. She realizes that this time it is no phantom, but her lost husband, and collapses. Linda Griffith plays the wife, who is thus restored to sanity, and she gives a fine portrayal. The picture is written by Bennet Musson and is well made.

"A GHOST MEETS A GHOST" (Thanhouser), April 6.—An interesting bit of film work, in which the ghost goes in and out of a bottle, like the genie in the Arabian Nights' tales. But it is little more than an interesting novelty and not to be depended upon as a strong feature.

"I LOVE YOU" (Majestic), April 20.—The story of a girl's pathetic attachment for a young man she rescued from drowning. He writes "I Love You" on the sand, but at the close she rubs it out, for his heart has turned to another. Better photography would have helped this story.

"PISA, ITALY" (Majestic), April 20.—Interesting views of Pisa and its leaning tower, on same reel with above.

"AS FATE WILLS" (Frontier), April 10.—This story begins with a typical scene on a city street, wherein a man falls and is taken to a hospital in an ambulance. The scenes which follow, covering episodes extending over fifteen years, are so unreal as to make the whole offering seem impossible. It is not in any way a strong film, though the photography is clear.

"LEO'S WATERLOO" (Imp), April 12.—A film story taken in France, featuring the well-known French comedy man known as Fool'shead. This half reel is nonsensical and not very funny.

"THE MYSTERIOUS CARD" (Imp), April 12.—A half film, on same reel with above, in which the possessor of a card bearing a mysterious legend of some sort, gets into numerous difficulties. The plot is much like that of a famous short story published some fifteen years ago, but in picture form it only gets up a fair degree of interest.

"PURE GOLD AND DROSS" (Rex), April 13.—One cannot say that, in the first half of this picture, there is any clearly marked story; but finally a dramatic situation is presented. A miner finds gold after his wife has left him and it seems to him but dross. There is a happy ending. It is only a passibly fair offering.

"THE ELIXIR OF YOUTH" (Powers), April 9.—A farce of queer characters in a summer hotel village. We have the two rival hotel men and the story turning on a certain well, whether it be the elixir of youth or something else. Spring water also was turned to the elixir of youth by the addition of rotten eggs in a recent Biograph picture; here the same idea is worked up in a different way and makes a fair offering. The photography is clear and there is comic acting.

"GOING FOR FATHER" (Eclair), April 13.—A light farce picture by the American company in an irresponsible, frolicsome mood that will make pastime for tired people. The tune at the village saloon is so lively that all who go for father have to stay and dance—the children first, then grandpa, then grandma. When mother comes, the entertainment is broken up and the farce ends at the home where the supper is burning on the stove. A very fair offering.

"THE OCTOPUS" (Eclair), April 13.—On the same reel is this remarkable picture of the dreadful octopus. It is well photographed and will make the timid shudder. None of us will want to go in bathing where it is likely to be.

"AN AFFRAY OF HONOR" (Nestor), April 16.—A comical village love story that has been cleverly handled and parts of it will surely make laughter. There is freshness even in the farcical duel of the two village characters. It is clearly photographed, but the old Nestor quality is not found. It is a commendable offering.

"A BOOK OF VERSES" (Rex), April 20.—This love story, with a semi-literary background, doesn't get what could be called a "punch," but it deals with interesting things. The public stenographer's old father is an unsuccessful poet and she sells his manuscripts to a society woman, who brings them out as her own. The young hero sees through the deception, for he has read the poems of the old man while still in writing. So we have the happy ending.

"THE FEAR" (Powers), April 11.—A psychological study of fear played successfully by F. MacDonald as a man who thinks that he has killed his friend in a foolish fight over a rabbit. He runs off and gets lost in the forest, would have died had not his wife gone to seek him. The picture stands on Mr. MacDonald's acting, which makes it both dramatic and interesting. The photography is very fair.

"BLOOD WILL TELL" (Imp), April 14.—This interesting picture was plainly written by someone who knew a thing or two about underworld life and knew how to write a picture. The acting and direction do much to make it seem realistic, though the situation is not hard to believe. The detective, who knows that his younger brother is not just what he should be, catches him in a serious theft and is about to deliver him up; but their mother pleads for the boy. William Shay plays the detective, Herbert Breonon, the boy, and Lillian Langdoo, their mother. That last scene was hardly worth while; the older brother didn't need to break the furniture to bolster his lie. If he had said, "My prisoner has escaped," that would have been enough. The photograph is good.

"THE LESSON" (Powers), April 16.—Here is one more of those human and truthful stories of child life by the Powers Company. It is set on a farm and makes a thoroughly delightful offering, one of the kind that ought not to be missed by any exhibitor. It is played by the same people that have appeared in former pictures by this company and producer, and is full of that kind of humor that is as deep as human experience. It is a perfect offering for any kind of entertainment and will entertain any kind of audience.

"A FRIEND OF THE FAMILY" (Rex), April 17.—The heroine of this picture is not the first shadow-character that has married a life-guardsman with whom she fell in love at the beach; but this is not a romance with the usual objecting parent. It is a problem picture and is meant to be realistic. In part, it succeeds in being so; but is not a great picture nor an absolutely truthful one. It has an interesting story; is very well acted, has some very pretty scenes in high life and is commendable as a popular offering.

"THE TROUBADOUR OF THE RANCHO" (Powers), April 18.—A picture that develops with a measure of freshness an often used situation and furnishes an interesting offering. Its backgrounds are especially good and this is a point in its favor that will make it stand out above most recent releases. The Mexican ranchero is so busy that his young wife is or thinks she is neglected. Her husband's false friend comes on a visit with the usual result. The pivotal character is the poor singer and he has a prominent part in saving her from ruining herself. The photography seems very good.

"HOW FATTY GOT EVEN" (Nestor), April 9.—Birdie's arrival at the ranch creates consternation among the boys. They will not let Fatty share in welcoming her, but he comes out winner in the end. The story is very conventional, and the duel scene at the last comes nearest to giving us a fresh situation. Even this was not handled very well.

"ANIMATED WEEKLY NO. 56" (Universal), April 2.—Cyclone and flood pictures lead the interest in this weekly summary of events, but there is a budget of attractive scenes in this number. The Omaha and Dayton views are of course most timely.

"SHANGHAIED" (Champion), April 7.—Starting with a scene in which a father attempts to drug his own son to keep him from marrying a certain girl, this film gives us a ridiculous series of events, none of which serve to make an interesting or convincing picture.

"LIFE SAVERS OF CHICAMACOMICO" (Champion), April 7.—A few views of a life saving crew manning a boat in high surf, on same reel with above.

"THE FORGOTTEN LETTER" (Nestor), April 11.—A film story covering thirty-five years of time. A young lover forgets to mail his letter proposing marriage to his sweetheart. Years later he discovers the letter in an old coat. He goes to her at once—she is now a widow—and is accepted. A pretty idea, though not very new, and not exceptionally well presented. The opening scenes were marred by the presence of a telephone and other modern facilities impossible to the time depicted.

"THE WANDERER" (Imp), April 7.—An allegorical offering, suggesting "The Servant in the House" and like productions. King Baggott, as the shepherd, descends into the city, where he prevents a married woman from throwing herself away on a stranger. The scenes are well pictured and when the shepherd returns to his flocks we feel that he has accomplished some good for mankind by his journey into the world. Not powerful, but strong in motive and thought-compelling.

"THE VEILED LADY" (Crystal), April 13.—To cure Chester of flirting, Pearl arranges an appointment for him with a negress. When he discovers the deception Chester beats a hasty retreat. Moderately amusing.

"OUR PARENTS IN LAW" (Crystal), April 13.—This, on same reel with above, brings about a marriage between Carrie's ma and Chester's pa, instead of the usual quarreling. A fairly interesting half reel.

"THE BURNING LARIAT" (Frontier), April 12.—The splendid scenic effects in this picture of mountains and plain are its strongest point. The story itself is too frankly sensational to be very convincing, yet it will appeal to many observers in spite of its impossible character. The herds of sheep and goats seen in the first portion of the film were picturesque. The photography is clear-cut throughout.

"THE MAID AND THE MILKMAN" (Nestor), April 7.—A comedy absurdity, in which Edward meets two pretty girls in the park. They take him home and one pretends to be the maid in order to give the older sister what is perhaps her "last chance." But Edward loves the other and pretends to be the milkman in order to get to see her. The scenes are laid in Hollywood, Cal., and are accordingly attractive.

"THE RIVER RHINE, GERMANY" (Nestor), April 7.—On same reel with above, some interesting glimpses of the beautiful Rhine, lined with feudal castles and cities.

"UNTIL DEATH" (Rex), April 10.—It would be difficult to recall during the releases of a year past a film story, extending over two reels, with a more tragically intense note than this. It grips the observer from the very start with the novelty of its theme and setting, and throughout it is a triumph of moving picture art. Phillips Smalley and Harry Pollard appear as the orchid hunting brothers, and Lois Weber enacts very creditably the girl whom they both love. The wilderness scenes are decidedly good, and Phil's desertion of his brother brings the first reel to a dramatic close. In the second reel Harry reappears. He falls over the cliff and she finds him buried in the loose earth, with but one hand visible. She dies holding his hand, and so the husband finds them at dawn. The psychological horror of this situation almost makes the observer wish it were not prolonged to so great an extent. Yet it is legitimate tragedy and gained by superior means. A powerful two-reel offering.

"PAYING FOR SILENCE" (Nestor), April 18.—This is a rather unconvincing newspaper yarn, in which the girl flirts with a newspaper reporter on a bet. Later her brother is caught cheating at cards and she makes an appeal to the newspaper man to save his name from unwelcome publicity. The scenes in the editorial room were dramatic, but scarcely true to conditions in the average newspaper office. The film suffers from static light rays.

"WITHIN THE LIMIT OF THE LAW" (Eclair), April 9.—This is a two-reel story, with the scenes located in France. The plot is peculiar and sets one to thinking. It shows how a doctor, in love with an adventuress, so far forgets the dignity of his calling as to perform an unnecessary operation on a wealthy patient. The proceeds, $6,000, he spends on the girl. The son of the countess afterward exposes the doctor in a dramatic way and in the final scene the physician commits suicide as his wife pounds upon the door. There were some lapses in this, as when the countess enters the operating room in street costume and picture hat, but on the whole it is well constructed and capably acted. A strong production.

"FOR LOVE OF COLUMBINE" (Reliance), April 12.—This film is not remarkable for its newness, as it pictures the familiar story of the clown who sacrifices the girl he loves to another man. Yet the story is entertaining and well presented and will please the average audience.

"HELD FOR RANSOM" (Reliance), April 16.—This is an out-of-door film story in two reels, of the ultra-romantic type. The hero abducts the rich man's daughter and holds her for ransom, or in other words until her father restores the property he obtained by fraud. The appearance of the apparition on the "haunted peak" leads the hero to release the girl, but by this time they are in love and she forces her father to return her lover's property. An entertaining feature.

"MURPHY'S I. O. U." (Keystone), April 17.—A fair half-reel comedy, in which Murphy, a policeman, gives his wife's jewels to a creditor, and learns to regret it. His wife pursues him and finally procures her jewels again.

"A DOLLAR DID IT" (Keystone), April 17.—This, on the same reel, is better than the above. It has many uproarious moments of the slapstick variety.

"A LIFE IN THE BALANCE" (Keystone), April 14.—One of the immensely funny creations the Keystone people occasionally turn out. A fine little baby is hung out of the window, apparently, in a basket attached to a spring muscle exerciser. The baby is given a bomb to play with. Three bomb throwers are the villains in the piece. It is a fine bit of extravagant burlesque and brings much laughter.

"RETROGRESSION" (Broncho), April 23.—A well-acted two-reel film, in which a convict goes West and tries to live an upright life, with his young daughter. But one of his pals escapes and follows him, and induces the man to blow up a safe. The plot has been done before in numerous ways, but the situations are dramatic and the characterizations good. Rusty and the girl handle their parts nicely, as well as the convict father. The Indian fighting in the second reel was spirited and exciting.

"THE CHANGELING" (Thanhouser), April 11.—In this picture the Thanhouser Kid plays the double role of the boy who was lost and the boy who was substituted by designing people. It makes an interesting, well-acted story of its kind.

"A BLACK CONSPIRACY" (Kaybee), May 2.—A two-reel war story, with a comedy ending instead of the usual series of dramatic episodes. The slave market scenes in the beginning are good and also the various scenes showing the love of the two faithful slaves for their home place. After the war, Capt. Rivers purchases the old Southern homestead at auction and the manner in which he and the girl are brought together by the former slaves, constitutes the "black conspiracy." A good offering.

"WILL O' THE WISP" (Kaybee), April 25.—A very attractive two-reel story, picturing in characteristic fashion the arrival of a circus in the early West. The wagons are drawn by oxen, and though the circus is not a large one, there is a carefulness of detail that is pleasing. The story shows how Jim's wife, who wins a prize riding, is lured away by the circus. Later comes the quarrel with the ring-master and she and the strong man and his wife quit the circus. The desert scenes are strong. A picturesque offering.

"A GAME OF POKER" (Keystone), April 10.—A really funny game at cards, in which Schnitzler reaches under the table and intercepts the straight flush the others are trying to use against him. He gets the money.

"FATHER'S CHOICE" (Keystone), April 10.—This, on same reel with above, shows us how Fred Mace and Mabel Normand black up to deceive the irate parent who opposes their marriage. Fairly interesting.

"THOSE GOOD OLD DAYS" (Keystone), April 7.—An elaborately costumed burlesque, showing the court of King Fizzle the Great. The opening scenes were very attractive and we had hopes of a stronger plot on which to base the subsequent action. The court fool was in evidence, the queen and her ladies in waiting, and altogether there was a chance for a little stronger story.

"THE PATRIOT" (Thanhouser), April 8.—A rather interesting story, built up principally to show the inauguration of President Woodrow Wilson in Washington. The country storekeeper, after forbidding his daughter's marriage, goes to the inauguration. He loses his pocketbook and rides home in a box car, just in time to be present at the wedding. A fairly good offering.

Always at Your Service

The Motion Picture Annual, published by the Chalmers Publishing Company, is always at your service. Put it in your desk and always leave it in the one place and its pages will give you an answer to most questions which interest the exhibitor. The Annual gives you a complete list of all releases issued in 1912 (Licensed and Independent). This feature alone is worth the price of the book, which sells at one dollar and twenty-five cents per copy in paper covers or $1.50 in cloth boards. To compile this list has been the work of many weeks. Other features are the trade directory, a history of motion pictures, something by Richardson on Projection and contributions by other prominent M. P. writers. The book is a practical volume of reference. Get it without delay.

"THE CHEYENNE MASSACRE"—Striking Scene From An Historic Indian Picture by the Kalem Company.

"THE CHEYENNE MASSACRE."

This two reel feature protraying a historic incident of Western pioneer days has much to commend it to the friends of Indian pictures. There are many clever touches of realism and the outdoor settings are up to the regular Kalem standard. There is a good deal of fighting in and about forts on the frontier line of white civilization, all of which is done with skill. The story abounds in incidents of the regulation variety which generally characterize Indian film dramas. Special praise may well be given to the splendid acting of Mr. West who plays the part of an Indian chief named Swift Bear. The military movements are all executed with that expertness and precision for which the Kalem Company have long been known.

LAEMMLE FILM SERVICE IN OMAHA BURNED OUT.

Carl Laemmle, president of the Universal Film Manufacturing Company, received word on Wednesday, April 9, that the quarters of the Laemmle Film Service at 1312 Farnum Street, Omaha, Neb., had been completely destroyed by fire at 1 o'clock that morning. The blaze originated in the store under the exchange. The minimum estimates of the loss exceed $30,000; there is no insurance. The customers of the exchange suffered no inconvenience by reason of the fire, however, as through the courtesy of the William H. Swanson Film Exchange of Denver a large quantity of film, including a sufficient supply of new pictures, was immediately shipped to the improvised Laemmle offices in Omaha, and business proceeded as usual.

KILL HIM NOW, OR LATER?

Bert Adler says there's a Thanhouser film released Sunday, April 13 in which a sagacious and indignant dog, placed in a baggage car, eats the baggage man's lunch when the latter is called from the car for a moment, and then smokes his cigar. Or at least, the dog seems to do these things. Bert admits there's a catch somewhere. Better see the reel called "The Dog in the Baggage Car" and sharpen up your razor.

MACE FOR MAYOR.

Fred Mace, formerly of Biograph and Keystone, but now preparing to make three reels a week on his own account, is preparing to run for mayor, and, as he naively remarks in a personal letter, "Funny part is that a big bunch here think I have a good chance of being elected."

He has made himself a tremendous favorite with the Los Angelicans since he took up his permanent residence there; he has played his part as a citizen in keeping things going, and some of the local politicians are so certain of his chances of success that they have entered nomination papers for Mace's candidacy for the nomination, which is the preliminary to the primaries under the California election laws. From the local press it would appear that he stands a fair chance of getting the nomination.

In keeping with his profession, the comedian announces that he will make his campaign through the picture houses and will release to the local theaters six or seven hundred feet showing "What I'll do if elected." He adds that he is preparing another two hundred strip picture of himself, with his dinner pail in one hand and a clean pair of overalls in the other, entering the new Mace plant. The title for this is "If defeated."

If Omaha can have a Cowboy Mayor, why not a Photoplayer Mayor for Los Angeles? It is one of the chief industries of the town now, and several million dollars of capital has been invested in the various plants.

Here's to Mayor Mace.

PATRICK COMES TO TOWN.

Mr. Warren A. Patrick, Chicago representative of the New York Clipper, made a flying visit to New York last week for a conference at the publication office of that paper. While in the city Mr. Patrick called at the office of the Moving Picture World to renew the acquaintance of his friends of the World.

PICTURES FOR THIS SEASON OF THE YEAR.

About this time of the year exhibitors who are interested in the general welfare of the community as good citizens, and who also desire to secure the co-operation of the various authorities in the educative and beneficial uses of the moving picture, the question of suitable pictures will readily present itself.

The subjects most suitable will be found under the catalogued titles as Sociological, Hygienic, Civic Improvement, Useful Arts and the Natural Sciences.

Every summer reports come in as to the value of such films as The Fly and Mosquito pests; common dangers as revealed under the microscope and known by various titles are valuable. From time to time these have been noticed on this page, the immediate object now is only in the nature of a reminder to the old readers, and to pass on the information to new readers and those who have never given this particular class of profitable exhibition work their attention.

Almost every week a new picture under one of the above titles is reviewed here, usually with such detail, that the newest user of them may be thoroughly posted as to their nature and purpose. The latest addition to the series, and very acceptable, is an Eclair natural science release entitled:

Animalculae Found in Stagnant Water Microscopically Revealed.

As it is not an uncommon custom to catch rain water in cisterns as it flows from the roof of the house, a picture shows the taking of the contents of a gutter on the house-top and subjecting it to micro-cinematographic analysis.

The result is perhaps as startling as it is interesting. The species named "paramecies" are found in great abundance, although only 1/10th of a millimeter in length, they are shown upon the screen enlarged 9,500 times. The great value of this powerful enlargement is profitable in the way it forces upon the beholder the fact that so great a disease breeder, which on account of its infinitesimal size has always been considered as of equally small danger; when, however, the real great dangers are known, and the enlargement of the cause of the danger is able to reveal its true disease producing possibilities, as shown in these pictures, all classes of people, both young and old, are going to take particular notice and allow themselves to be educated in ways so much to their own advantage.

Other pictures show details of these animalculae enlarged 20,-

000 times, by which means their method of rapid reproduction and growth are graphically illustrated, and the further danger of their toleration exposed. Such films as these cannot fail to do much toward encouraging cleanliness and care in the uses of water and bringing out the evils of allowing any body of water, no matter how small, to remain anywhere where stagnation is possible. W. H. J.

HABITS OF FIELD SPIDERS.

"The Spider and the Fly" is known to every school child, as a suspension bridge-builder, the spider is a wonder to the scientist, while a king has been known to learn a lesson of perseverance from this very unwelcome insect. All these lessons are taught again with the added thoroughness only possible to the powers of the moving picture, and, to "succeed by trying again" will be but one of many new lessons this Eclair film teaches. "The life of spiders furnishes an admirable example of development and phenomenal instinct in the struggle for life." The wonderful spreading of the web when seen so enlarged is marvelous; the powerful claws, or rather claw-like mouth, show how easily it can hold and conquer its prey, while many of its habits and conquests are shown in great detail and with valuable descriptive sub-titles which also explain the different species. W. H. J.

THE SCHOOL PROBLEM AND A SUGGESTION.

On every hand the question of putting the moving picture in the schools is causing much thought. It is no longer a question of its adaptability; argument and predictions have been overcome by the abundant merits of the Kinematograph itself.

Everywhere now it is conceded that the moving picture is the greatest need of the schools; how best to acquire its earliest uses is the problem confronting all authorities and teachers. A suggestion is made by Mr. John Collier, secretary of the National Board of Censorship, which we quote in part, not necessarily because the suggestion may or may not be a good one, but because Mr. Collier is in a position of some authority, and what he says will command some attention, and further because out of such suggestions as these the final solution of the problem will come.

Mr. Collier says: "What the motion picture movement needs is that the whole matter should be taken hold of by some progressive wealthy or wide-awake State Government which will take pictures out of the rut, and give them a chance to develop along natural, educational, ethical, and artistic lines. We need municipal circulating libraries of moving pictures. The city should own the films and rent them out to public schools, libraries, settlements and recreation centers. The public school needs the pictures." They are the most vital and most impressive way of presenting ideas. Children learn by seeing who cannot think in abstraction, and herein lies one of the newest powers and greatest successful possibilities of the moving picture. "Yet what happens when any school tries to get certain pictures? They find the required films are 'on the road' probably in some distant part of the country, in such a circulation that it is almost impossible ever again to get any particular picture, after it has once started on its circuit." The crude system of booking which is responsible for this would be overcome if some governmental system—local or otherwise—could be adopted in line with the above suggestion of a form of municipal ownership. Mr. Collier's proposals have in them much that can be used as a basis upon which a step forward can be taken.

Those who, like Mr. Collier and the writer, are in the center of that movement which is growing everywhere for the development of the uses of the educational picture, cannot but feel pained at the present helplessness, which is holding back from the schools of the world that very power which it most needs. There is, however, no occasion for worry or despair; the question is one of those great ones which always works out its own end, by force of its irresistible merit and power; the agency of man is chiefly secondary in doing his utmost to help in making easier, smoother, and quicker, the certain destination to which the power will ultimately arrive. W. H. J.

THE CIRCULATING LIBRARY.

The circulating library idea as applied to educational films is without doubt one of great importance. If the idea has been found sufficiently profitable when applied to books, how much more so may it be of value when applied to moving pictures.

In England, the government, having control of the schools of art, does not hesitate to keep in circulation a large number of the best pictures, many of them known as "the best masters," so that in course of time the students throughout the country become both familiar with and educated by that which is of the greatest importance to them.

The writer does not hesitate to predict that from the experience gained by associating with those to whom the question is of immediate and vital importance that this plan is the first one which will be put in operation, and there is much doubt as to whether it will ever be superceded by a better one, as while there are some films which every school will be compelled to own, there are many which for a number of years at least will be only subject to such occasional use as to make their circulation a matter of necessity. In England, Germany and France, this very problem is receiving the present and immediate attention of the authorities; the United States is more tardy than any of the progressive educationalists; that this condition will continue long is impossible, the pressure and demand are both too great, and in nothing is America behind when once the situation proves itself. POPULAR PAUL SCARDON TO JOIN THE RELIANCE COMPANY.

At the culmination of his long contract with the Majestic Company, on April 12th. Paul Scardon transferred his affections to the Reliance Company. Mr. Scardon, who comes originally from Australia, has made himself immensely popular with the picture fans all over the civilized world. He has proven himself to be as much at home in low comedy as he is in the highest class drama, and will be a valuable addition to the ranks of Reliance's famous players.

Foreign Trade Notes

BRITISH NOTES.

By Our Own Correspondent.

An English firm of manufacturers are just about to place on the market a new electric moving picture camera. The machine derives its power from an electric charge fitted in before use and can be carried about like a hand camera. No tripod is required and when in use the camera is held in the hand like an amateur's hand camera, being steadied with a gyroscope fitted in the body. It is promised an enormous future here.

The chief constable of Oldham, a large industrial center, puts forward a plea for the suppression of pictures calculated to impair the morals of young persons. A manager of a theater has replied to this and says that children positively groan when a travel picture is shown to them.

An important agreement has been come to between British renters and manufacturers during the past week. In future all films sold to the renters by the manufacturers will be accompanied by a license under the 1911 Copyright Act. This will stipulate and define precisely under what conditions the film can be exhibited, the primary object of this concerted action being, of course, to stop the supply of films to theaters which show films that are not on the open market. By using this license under the Copyright Act, the manufacturers will be able to take legal action against renters infringing their copyright hy supplying films to showmen exhibiting monopolized subjects.

Another agreement has also been made between the two bodies to provide for the destruction of all positive films after they have been in circulation twelve months. It is hoped by this means to keep screens clear of "dope" or "junk" or "hailstorms," which are often included in programmes of good films to the detriment of the latter.

Here is something really unique! A moving picture theater opened by royalty. Such was the happy distinction of the "West End" kinema described in my last letter which was opened on March 18th by Princess Alexander of Teck. The new show is in the heart of London "theaterland." Prince and Princess Alexander arrived at three in the afternoon and were received by the chairman of the company, Mr. W. L. Thoelford, who read an address of welcome. A bouquet was presented to the Princess and the royal couple then proceeded to the special box without delay and witnessed the first program through.

"If the public enjoy watching our pictures any better than Sophie and I enjoy making 'em, they'll have to whistle some," —thus Mr. Augustus Carney's message to his native county, "Ould Oireland" in a London journal.

I have it on good first-hand authority that at the great Anglo-American Exhibition to be held in London next year one of the principal attractions will be a gorgeous moving picture theater on a plan that seems almost insane in its extravagance and sumptuousness. As yet the whole scheme is in embryo, but the promoters have already allocated $5,000,000, to the building up alone of the exhibition.

Miss Phyllis Victoria, a picture theater musician, has been nominated for election as a member of the Stroud Urban Council. Her struggle for existence has been most romantic, for a few years ago she and her brother were stranded as "road actors" in Stroud. They lived in an empty house and worked as farm laborers for a few weeks until, on the verge of starvation, they took over a disused chapel and opened it as a picture show. They had to borrow coppers to put in the gas meter for the light on the opening night, but now the show is one of the best in the district.

Mr. Charles Urban, the Kinemacolor pioneer, is projecting an extraordinary film at his Scala theater. The exposures rush through the "gate" at a speed of over 2,000 a minute instead of the normal rate of 960 a minute. The film is a native subject and will probably be shown, if it has not already appeared, at the Kinemacolor home in New York City.

Dr. H. V. G. Macleod of Queen Victoria's Jubilee Institute for Nurses, London, has recently, in conjunction with Dr. T. H. Weisenburg of the Philadelphia General Hospital, been giving demonstrations proving the value of the moving picture as an aid to the study of bacteriology. The American doctor has two miles of films which he has taken himself.

Mr. Hubert F. Baldwin, a press photographer who followed the Balkan War, says that the moving picture operator is a failure. He applies the qualification (or disqualification) to both the European and American cameramen. Some of them, he says, could not see the picture and actually waited for "fighting" though how they thought to obtain fighting pictures is best known to themselves. He concludes that the cameraman in future for such work will have to have a journalistic training.

British films are increasing in popularity in Germany. Official returns show that more than half the films imported by the Fatherland come from England and America together. The annual value of these is £1,250,000.

A not uncommon practice of some film agencies here is the retailing out to children of short strips of worn-out firms, say at a penny or two pence a time. In view of this the Tottenham Council has informed the Home Secretary, with a request that the matter be brought before the Royal Commission now sitting on the subject of celluloid. The report states that small children can procure sufficient of this dangerous material to produce the gravest results. As the probable outcome, kinema theater proprietors and renters will be warned.

Considerable agitation is being manifested, principally by the pseudo-puritans in London and Glasgow, respecting the cheap and gaudy posters used to advertise some brands of films. This unpleasant stigma has at some time or other been cast over every make of film exhibited here, through the activities of cheap and unscrupulous printing firms in flooding the market with old stock discarded by theatrical companies. The custom now, however, is for the makers to send out their own posters direct to the renter. The pioneers of this movement here were the Selig and Vitagraph companies and both Mr. Montagu and Mr. Smith, their respective agents, have now a separate department for dealing with posters. But a new series which are winning the admiration of every manager are those of the Rex Company of America. On the other hand, a prominent French company which is very much in the limelight just now will persist in sending posters printed in French to England.

A Shakespearean revival by kinema is being projected in the north of England by a Shakespearean society. The films are to include "As You Like It," by the Vitagraph Company, as the premier item. In fact, from the list of films I have received, eighty per cent. of those to be shown are Vitagraphs.

OBSERVATIONS

BY OUR MAN ABOUT TOWN

IN AN interview accorded Mr. Charles Darnton, dramatic editor of the Evening World, a few days ago, Mr. Daniel Frohman, one of the leading theatrical producers and managers of this country, and managing director of the Famous Players Film Company, which has produced "The Prisoner of Zenda," in motion pictures, interestingly outlines what he has in mind for the photoplay field of the future. Although Mr. Frohman's idea is termed "a new move in the 'movies' that will work revolution," it is not an original one, with possibly one exception. The work he intends carrying out will be the fulfillment of prophecies made by the watchful people a long time ago. It will be the adoption of a policy of leading photoplay producers—the Old Guard of the business, they may be more appropriately called. Mr. Frohman's main undertaking will be successful, because it is founded upon lines which is bound to be important factors in the elevation of the photoplays to a plane that will make them enduring and attract to the picture houses even a still greater patronage from the higher class of patrons than is now accorded them. In this respect it will place these picture houses on a par with the best in the theatrical business, and benefit the motion picture business generally. It is for this reason that Mr. Frohman's advent into the field has not been opposed by, or created uneasiness on the part of, the producers who have elevated the photoplays to their present standard. The attitude of the latter may be summarized thus: The term "film manufacturers" will soon become obsolete, replaced by the more dignified one of "producers," all being bent in achieving the same end sought by the new comer to the field. This classification may possibly be resented in some quarters as undesirable, but it will soon be adjusted to conditions. It may be claimed that some pictures do not give the producers the right to claim positions on a par with others. There is where the turning point will come and the "survival of the fittest" will be effectively demonstrated. It will be decided by the public. Those upon whom it places its stamp of approbation will become the photoplay producers and those who operate on the theory that people go to see motion pictures simply because they are such, and sacrifice those things which are essential to the kind of productions the people want in order to make as much money as possible in the shortest possible time, will become the pikers of the business.

As far back as eight years ago, the "Old Guard" predicted in the columns of the magazines devoted to the interests of the motion picture business that the people who were deriding the pictures as a short-lived elaboration of the stereopticon and slot machine devices would see them dedicated to posterity, and the time has come. In the interview referred to, Mr. Frohman uses the expressions, "I believe the industry is in its infancy," "How far it will go remains to be seen. It is like throwing a pebble in a pond—the ripples spread in every direction."

* * *

The interview, although reflecting views that are not entirely original, has attracted wide-spread attention. The one idea to which originality attaches, is the outlining of a plan by which successful plays converted to picture form shall take on a fourth life. The first will be in the two dollar houses of the New York theatrical field, the one-dollar life will be in the combination houses, and then they will take on the fifty-cent life in the stock company theaters, after which the plays, in picture form, will go into the picture houses. Whether or not it will become practicable remains to be seen. It sounds good, but many who have discussed it are inclined to the belief that the plays in picture form will force themselves to a better than fourth position. Some time ago the Moving Picture World pointed to the great advantage to which photoplays based upon leading productions could be adapted in drawing people to the theaters making the original productions and in one of his statements, Mr. Frohman indorses the views. He said, "I think we shall be a hopeful ally to the stage by drawing those who see the pictured play to the theater." This seems to be nearer the mark. If the photoplay is to await the passage of the originals through the three grades of theaters that have been mentioned there is danger of the photoplay life losing its vigor for the time being, and the necessity presenting itself that the photoplay production be placed on the shelf until a revival becomes opportune. It is true that nothing can replace the magnetism of the living actor. From this point of view it is equally true that it would not be good policy to have original and photo-form productions simultaneously in the same city, but the magnetism of the photoplay will also suffer if it is held back until almost all theatergoers have had an opportunity to see the play itself. They patronize the photoplay houses as well as the theaters and expect as much from the former as the latter, so far as new attractions are concerned. What they see in the picture houses will undoubtedly entice them to go and see original productions, but it is doubtful that the reverse would be effective.

But whatever may be the outcome, so long as the regular photoplay producers maintain the required standard they will continue in the running. There is a big field for feature productions and it is constantly growing, and there is also similar inducements for the short-story film. Features consist of two or more reels. The length is required to properly bring out all the striking points of the play or story. They are in a class by themselves. Short photoplays also control a domain. They are made from stories of merit that cannot be extended beyond one reel. In many instances they hold the same interest as many of the feature subjects and they will continue to hold their places on the programs. They also retain their popularity on account of the variety of tastes of audiences. In some places feature reels are the more popular. The appetite for them is strong and growing in this country. In Europe and many other foreign countries there is a great demand for them, but in nearly all quarters the audiences yearn for variety—short stories of an effective, sentimental character, and comedy. Educational subjects are also desired and in this case it has been found that one reel is the most desired, because there is danger of monotony.

So it can be seen that the field continues open for all styles of merit—long and short. The advent of the big producers is not of a threatening nature to those already on the ground. In fact, there is only one thing that warrants uneasiness; that is the multiplicity of producers. There is danger of the market becoming stagnated and, the most to be feared, the effect of inferior productions.

* * *

And now the vaudeville profession is asking why it should not figure in the motion picture possibilities. The answer is plain. With the talking feature eliminated from the pictures, vaudeville acts without voices are devoid of interest. They have been tried time and time again. Occasionally some novelty act has made good, but none of them has stood repetition. Years ago, when the pictures were known as "chasers" in the vaudeville theaters, short films were introduced, showing strong men, acrobatic and dancing acts, and the work of magicians were demonstrated. The pictures themselves were a novelty at that time, and, consequently, helped the acts along, but soon the people learned that trick photography was an important factor in the making of the pictures, and from that time on, no matter how good the acts were, they could not become interested. They declared the performer was not the original and what was shown them was simply the creation of trick photography on the part of the film maker. This impression resulted in the gradual and absolute disappearance of such films. At one time a famous manufacturer in France did an enormous business in this country with films, based upon magical acts. People wondered how this and that was done. They were astonished by some of the productions and amused to the extreme by others, but as the explanation gradually gained circulation their admiration and amusement turned to—well, I guess it was offended dignity. They seemed to feel that part of the price of admission had been repaid by trickery and nothing but travel and story pictures could hold them. There are some very clever vaudeville acts on the bills to-day, but none that any well-equipped studio cannot reproduce with equal effect, although doing so with practically the camera alone, the figures being mere tools. A few years ago Harry Lauder posed for a film, showing his act, but it fell flat. His entrance, walks and exits created a laugh, but to get a film of fair size repetitions were required and the subject became monotonous.

It is announced that a Baltimore inventor has perfected a new motion picture-taking device that will combine with the pictures an apparent perfect reproduction of voices of the performers. It is said to be especially adaptable to singing acts. If he has the right thing vaudeville performers may take courage. If a correct, synchronizing reproduction of the voice is there, a big field will be found for the films. Then another discontented element will arise in protest. It will mark the gradual fading away of the illustrated song singer. In many respects it will be a blessing. A great many picture houses have suffered in reputation and other respects through placing the song part of their programs in the hands of those having more talent in the mashing line than for singing.

At the Sign of the Flaming Arcs

By George Blaisdell.

A LETTER to the editor of the New York Times refers to the complaints of literary friends of the writer, "L. J. W.," as to their poor luck in selling a photoplay. These friends, he says, include writers of books and plays, successful in their own field. After looking at some of the filmed melodramas on Broadway he understands why they are unable to land scenarios. He adds: "I also know, and am willing to make affidavit to it, that any one who is capable of writing a photoplay is not capable of writing anything else, unless it is a check, which I understand some of them can do quite successfully. Nobody knows until he has had a night of moving picture melodrama what a photoplay manager and a photoplay writer can do with a 5-and-10-cent public. Then he doesn't know which of the three to be sorriest for."

It is to be regretted that the whining person had not the faculty of observing the sort of people he was sitting in with. Had he looked about him, in any house on Broadway, he would have found the same kind of people he would find in the houses where $2 is charged to look at the actors in the flesh. "L. J. W." is worthy of attention only insofar as he represents a type, now happily diminishing in number, and diminishing rapidly. Moving pictures have made deep appeal to what Dr. Howells has described as the "inspired knowledge of the multitude." Uncover a man who proclaims that he sees nothing in pictures to interest him and you will find ninety-nine times out of a hundred a man who has never seen good pictures or else one who is too tired to think. Manufacturers do impose on picture-goers at times. We'll all concede that. Pictures are shown which bear every evidence of studio origin, of haste in preparation. Sometimes it seems like a case of the director saying to the scenario editor: "Give me a script in an hour and a half—make it about a hotel." Of course, the story may be a good one, but the odds are against it.

Pictures are improving in quality—especially in the stories. This is due to a realization by producers that the story is the base of the picture. If book and play writers are unable to sell scripts, it is because they can not and will not comprehend that script writing is a trade—a trade requiring study and observation, and still better a little coaching from one who knows the ropes. This writer knows a young man who in ten minutes' conversation with a screen player learned more about photoplay construction than he had been able to pick up in two years' attendance at photoplays and unaided and unsuccessful writing.

The remuneration of script writers will steadily increase. That today the money paid by manufacturers is, as a rule, totally inadequate, is beyond question. Allowing $1,000 as the cost of a single reel—and this is a fair allowance—does it not stand to reason that $25, or 2½ per cent., invested in script is disproportionate? Coming back to where we started, the "successful book and play writer" will command attention and be welcomed when he realizes that writing photoplays is serious business, demands technical knowledge and is not to be approached solely as a means of relaxation or recreation.

Matt Snyder dropped in at the Screen Club on a Saturday night. The Thursday and Friday preceding he had been working in big scenes portraying the French Revolution—of raging mobs—in "Robespierre," which Imp is making for the screen. As the veteran explained to the writer, he had never in all his long professional career worked so hard as on these two days. His articulation was a whisper.

"I lost it in moving pictures," was the seemingly paradoxical response.

And yet we talk about the "silent" drama.

The World staff received a most pleasant call last week from Miss Margaret I. MacDonald, the well known film writer. Robert A. Olsson arrived in New York on April 1, and on the 3d left for the Kinemacolor studios in Los Angeles, Cal. Mr. Olsson is a cameraman, and has recently returned from Moscow, where he made pictures of the Czar of all the Russias at the celebration of the three hundredth anniversary of the founding of the house of Romanoff. When Mr. Olsson was asked how the Czar took to the camera he smiled. He replied that the Russian ruler was not particularly concerned, but that the detectives assigned as his bodyguard were more than careful of his safety. Not only was Mr. Olsson surrounded while the filming was in progress, but he was compelled to take his camera apart and convince the officers of the law that there was nothing of a contraband nature about his apparatus. Mr. Olsson is a native of Sweden, and has done much work in cold climates, such as obtains in Spitzbergen and Northern Siberia, for instance. He has had ten years' experience in motion photography. For the Kinemacolor Company he has made picturesque Swiss and Norwegian scenes and the "Life in Lapland," which have been popular with Kinemacolor patrons. On his trip West he was accompanied by Alfred Gosden, who will work with him in photographing the Kinemacolor stock companies in a new series of photoplays prepared by Leo Dougherty, the head of the scenario department.

Talk about the fashions being influenced by moving pictures! Just saw, out on Broadway, a belt on a female figure that for breadth and "hang" would make the real thing on a two-gun man dwindle to toy-shop proportions — still talking about the belt, of course; the figure was all right. There was no gun attached to this outfit, however; there didn't have to be.

On Thursday, April 2, Essanay released "The Will-Be Weds," a comedy. An automobile ride formed one of the scenes. On the Friday following the same company issued a costume drama, "A Wolf Among Lambs." In a certain New York house each picture was shown as a first run. On Friday when "A Wolf Among Lambs" was on the screen the manager heard a shout from the audience. Glancing up he recognized the automobile ride of the comedy of the day before. Before the drama was again exhibited the comedy was eliminated. Now the manager has a thirty-foot strip of film for a souvenir.

The principals have been selected with great care, especially those portraying the king and queen and the dauphin and duchess.

"When I go around to the different studios and see the good actors—men and women—looking for a day's work at $5 per, I can't help believing that the cream has gone out of the moving picture end of the business," remarked an unemployed director-leading man the other day. Which brings to mind a reminiscence of "Bill" Shea, the popular Vitagraph comedian, conveyed to the writer last fall. Mr. Shea was talking of his early days with the Vitagraph, nine or ten years ago, when "life portrayals" were taken on the roof of an office building in crowded Nassau Street, downtown. Mr. Blackton would ask Mr. Shea if he could get one or two actors for the following day. Up on the Rialto the comedian would buttonhole an old pal and suggest to him that by coming downtown the next day a bit of easy money could be picked up.

"What! Me—in moving pictures!" would be the frequent and indignant response. "I guess not!"

"You see," said "Bill," with his broad and famous smile, "times have changed."

IT has been said that the American producers of motion pictures could not equal the magnificent work accomplished by some of the foreign companies, but this theory has been exploded by the achievements by Charles L. Gaskill, and the Helen Gardner Picture Players, of which he is director and general manager. "Cleopatra," as almost everybody in the business now knows, stands out as one of the crowning efforts of the American producer. It was, in fact, the first big production to be made in this country, and its success has encouraged others to attempt similar productions. No one withholds from Mr. Gaskill the credit due him, as the author of the script and the director of the production.

"THE CAPTURE," (Essanay).

A clever and eccentric story, well portrayed with screamingly funny incidents, is "The Capture." Following is a short synopsis:

It is the unexpected things in life that happen, which was proven when Bob Burns applied to John Hennessy for a position. Burns is told that single men are not engaged, that if he gets married by twelve o'clock the following day, the position is his. Burns writes two of his young lady friends, asking them to marry him and to meet him at eleven o'clock. Undecided which one to mail, he allows a young boy to pick one of the letters out of his pocket and mail it. By accident, the other letter drops to the sidewalk. A good samaritan, seeing the letter, picks it up, and drops it into the mail box. The next morning at the appointed hour the two ladies arrive on the scene, and claim Burns for their's. Not knowing what to do, Burns simply throws up the sponge and takes to his heels. Burns runs into an apartment building, where he comes face to face with an old sweetheart of his. Bob proposes to her and is accepted. They get married. Bob and his young bride arrive at his employer's office, where the young ladies rush in with a policeman. Mr. Hennessy is overwhelmed when he discovers that Burns' young bride is his daughter, Ruth.

MARRIAGE LICENSE

Scene from "The Capture" (Essanay).

Smiling "Billy" Mason as Bob Burns, creates a furor, his pleasing personality in this picture captured the audience upon his entrance. Ruth Hennessy as herself, does creditable work in this picture.

This production is booked for release April 16th.

"THE END OF THE QUEST" (Lubin).

This Lubin picture is very melodramatic, but will be appreciated for its intense Italian quality. The characters are all children of Sunny Italy and typical of the hot blood of the Latin race. The scenes are laid in Italy and the United States and true to both countries and conditions. Love dominates the story and the end is the just consequence of the evil doer.

Rosa and Pietro were very happy in the little Italian village until Guiseppo Rocco, a well-dressed Italian came along and, with pictures of America and many promises, decoyed her away. Pietro vowed vengeance and followed them. Walking New York for many days and failing in his quest, he took work in a barber shop and prospered. One night he saw a woman carrying a baby and fainting. He took her to his lodging and recognized Rosa. Pietro did all he could, but she died leaving the little baby girl to his care. Five years later he was the owner of the barber shop, when a stranger entered and wanted his beard shaved off. Pietro recognized the man who had wrecked his life and was about to kill him when the little girl came in and stayed his hand. But the shock of the discovery and the fear of vengeance had frightened Rocco and he died of heart failure. The child and foster father fell upon their knees in prayer as the vision of Rosa appeared and smiled in appreciation.

BENNIE PROMOTES PUBLICITY.

The Lubin Manufacturing Company will have another champion ball team this year and Bennie from Lubinville, who has been promoted into long trousers with cuffs on the lower ends of the legs, is to be the publicity promoter. He announces that the team would like to hear from all "first class teams, motion picture manufacturers preferred." We know of no team composed of motion picture manufacturers, but if their employees have formed teams for the coming season and want to be licked, they can apply at Lubinville and be assured of prompt and effective service. With Cy Morgan on the pay roll they will have an excellent coach and Ira Lowery, Mr. Lubin's son-in-law and general manager, has forgotten a lot about ball playing that most people have yet to learn—and there is a lot he has not forgotten.

In addition to Bennie the official staff consists of James J. Humphreys, President; "Doc" Travers, Secretary and William H. Kerry, Treasurer. Bennie from Lubinville is publicity promoter. We said that before, but he told us three times. Perhaps the publicity promoter, (who is Bennie from Lubinville) will loosen up on the players' names presently.

"O KOMA SAN" (Gaumont).

Atmospheric of John Luther Long's "Madame Butterfly" and the vivid potency of Puccini's orchestrations is the Gaumont hand-colored subject, "O Koma San."

Although difficult to make up French actors to look like Japanese, there has been facility displayed in "dressing" the characters for this Nipponese play. The scenic effects are rich. The feminine actors were well trained in the short-stepping movements of the Japanese women and their docile manner. The story substantiates the woes of the Geisha girls so ably delineated in "Madame Butterfly." A trusting lot are these maidens in the Far East and their faith in men sometimes hard to justify.

Scene from "O Koma San" (Gaumont).

It is the tale of a Geisha girl who surrenders herself and her all to a Japanese prince, who basks in the sunshine of their near-connubial bliss until an order recalls him to Tokio. He, of course, swears upon the memories of his most honorable ancestors that he will return ere the robins nest again to claim his bride-to-be. Similar to a celebrated pugilist, he never "comes back."

O Koma stays at home caring for the little one who so vividly and significantly reminds her that she had once been loved by a prince and, who had adopted the adage, "He, who loves and runs away, will live to love another day." The result is tragedy. When O Koma San, carrying her fatherless child, seeks her errant lover in his Tokio palace she learns that he is now the husband of another woman. O Koma, desperate, is about to plunge her dagger into the heart that had won him whom she had lost. Dissauded she commits hara kiri.

AMERICAN "SHOOTS" CAPT. ROALD AMUNDSEN.

Captain Roald Amundsen, the antarctic explorer, scheduled to speak in Santa Barbara, Cal., last week, encountered a rather troublesome floe on a temptuous sea of embarrassment when the American's cameraman, under direction of Wallace Kerrigan, insisted on shooting him. The captain was being driven about the town. At the southern end of the town a miniature South Pole had been erected where the captain was expected to speak. After getting fairly under way, the captain noticed that he was being photographed and stopped to remark that he was breaking his contract quite against his will. Nevertheless, the American obtained some good pictures of the famous explorer.

The title of the Ambrosio release for April 19th has been changed from "To Save the Children" to "Child Labor Traffic." Exhibitors will please take note of the change.

"FOR LOVE OF COLUMBINE," (Reliance).

This interesting photodrama by M. B. Havey is woven about the lines of the two principal players in the big pantomine show—Pierrot and Columbine. Pierrot loved Columbine, but she gave her heart to a rich admirer who married her and took her away from the make believe world, leaving Pierrot with a breaking heart. Later, trouble comes to Columbine, for she is still the butterfly and her rich husband will not overlook her folly, so she is cast upon the world. Pierrot finds her and takes care of her until husband relents and takes her back. Knowing that she is happy at last, Pierrot creeps away to his dressing room and, with breaking heart, dons his clown's costume and goes forth to make the thousands laugh.

Miss Irene Howley as Columbine.

Oscar C. Apfel directed this picture and he has made an exceptionally fine thing of it. Irene Howley makes an ideal Columbine, pretty, graceful and ably portrays the varying moods of the capricious heroine. Irving Cummings plays the husband with his usual ease and polish. Exceptionally good work is done by George Siegman in the role of Pierrot.

CORRESPONDENCE

NEW ENGLAND.

ON Tuesday, April 1, there was a good sized gathering of exhibitors at the exhibition room of the Massachusetts branch of the Exhibitors' League, while the General Film Company was showing its advance releases. It was reported that two exhibitors, Messrs. McManns, of Riverpoint, R. I., and Cahill, of Brockton, Mass., were on the sick list, which fact immediately stirred the exhibitors to action. A contribution was raised on the spot, and elegant bouquets of flowers were sent to the indisposed managers.

Superintendent of Boston Schools, Franklin B. Dyer, speaking at the City Club, Boston, on April 2, stated that in his opinion, the harm in motion picture shows for young boys is not in the pictures, which, he believes, are carefully watched over, but in the fact that the show is only a passive amusement. Mr. Dyer delivered himself of this erudite opinion at the monthly meeting of the delegates from Boston to the United Improvement Association. Mr. Dyer also thinks that baseball is bad for boys, because they become so much taken up with the sport. Of course it is universally understood that baseball is a great thing for youngsters, as it develops mind and body. Mr. Dyer can hardly understand Motography, if he calls it a passive amusement, for there is nothing that so easily stimulates the mind to activity. Mr. Dyer should realize that moving pictures are a great agency for education, and as an educator, should give the cinematograph the serious study and careful attention it so richly deserves.

Kalem's masterpiece, "From the Manger to the Cross," is making a decided hit in Boston, not only in moving, but also in still pictures. By permission of the Kalem Company, the Boston Herald is printing, each night, large photographs of the various scenes going to make up the great religious Kalem feature.

The fair Lillian Russell appeared at Symphony Hall, Boston, this week, at prices up to $1.50, in her entertainment entitled, "How to Live 100 Years." Lillian was assisted by Kinemacolor pictures, to help explain her "beauty secrets."

H. Apperson Jones, the young speaker, who created so much favorable comment last year, when lecturing at Tremont Temple, Boston, with the Kinemacolor pictures of the "Indian Durbar," returned to Boston this week, in presentation of "The Making of the Panama Canal," and "Actual Scenes of the Balkan War." Mr. Jones delivers an unusually effective and instructive lecture on these pictures.

A fire that started in Gane's Witch Theater, 213 Essex street, Salem, Mass., on April 2, threatened to injure the business section of the city. It is thought that the fire started in the manager's office, just off the second balcony. The Empire and Salem theaters were both endangered by this fire. The Witch Theater was empty when the fire broke out, but the smoke poured into the nearby Empire Theater, and a panic was narrowly averted. Gane's Witch Theater was built last summer, and opened this fall. It was an expensive theater and one of the most modern in the state. Moving pictures and vaudeville programs were the policy. Mr. William Gane, of New York, the lessee, will probably have the theater rebuilt. The total loss was about $100,000, a good part of which figure is the damage sustained by the Witch Theater.

Last week, a testimonial was held at the Gem Theater, East Boston, in aid of the widow of the late Mr. Morrison. Mr. Greenberg, owner of the Gem, gave, free of charge, the use of his theater and its employees, and the Variety Booking offices of Boston, furnished the vaudeville talent gratis. A very neat sum was turned over to Mrs. Morrison.

Frank LeBrowne, who, at various times, managed the Pastime, Beacon, Old South, Washington, Shawmut, Star and several other theaters in and around Boston, has deserted that end of the theatrical business and is now a vaudeville artist.

The Broadway Theater, Springfield, Mass., one of the string of theaters owned by the Goldstein Brothers' Amusement Company, is to play stock company attractions for the summer season, after which it will return to the regulation programs of vaudeville and pictures.

John J. Moewer, manager of the Nemo Theater, New York, has been transferred to the Nelson Theater, Springfield, Mass. Mr. Joseph Carr, formerly of the Nelson, has been switched to the Gotham Theater, New York.

Senator Frolich has introduced a bill in the legislature of Connecticut, which calls for the operation of moving picture theaters on Sundays. The Senator is a true friend of this industry, and every Connecticut exhibitor should do his share towards getting this bill passed. It will mean a great deal to the moving picture men of this state.

Manager Eslow, of the Boston offices of the Mutual Film Corporation, finds business very good in this territory, and believes that his new offices at 1106 Boylston street, are just about the finest ever. Mr. Eslow states that business is so good through Maine that he will open a branch at Waterville, in charge of Mr. Fred Murphy.

"The Amusement Problem," was the subject of Rev. Rockwell Potter's address before the Center Church, Hartford, Conn., last week. Rev. Potter spoke extremely well of the pictures, saying that they accomplished much more good for the people than the high class theaters.

E. S. Delaney is taking bids on his new theater, which is to be built at Norwich, Conn., this spring. Plans have been drawn up by W. H. McElfatrick & Company, of New York, which call for a theater seating very nearly 1,200 people. The house will be thoroughly modern in every particular, and will be erected at considerable cost. Mr. Delaney states that he will leave no stone unturned to produce the finest theater in Norwich, devoted to photoplays and vaudeville.

The Empire Theater, Pittsfield, Mass., which has been playing stock company attractions for the last thirty weeks, has closed temporarily, and Harold B. Franklin, who managed the house, is sought by the deputy sheriffs. It seems that business at the Empire was very bad, and that the various employees did not receive their salaries. The house will probably open before long, with programs of vaudeville and pictures.

Another theater in this territory, at Lowell, Mass., found that the public did not care for stock company shows and was forced to close. This house also will reopen with attractions of vaudeville and photoplays, before long.

S. Z. Poli's theater, Springfield, Mass., which has been playing vaudeville and picture programs, changed its policy on April 7, when it opened with stock company attractions. The new Broadway Theater, also of Springfield, Mass., will play stock company shows, starting April 21. Next fall, both the Poli and Broadway theaters will revert to vaudeville and pictures.

A benefit performance was given last Sunday night at Poli's Theater, Bridgeport, Conn., for the flood sufferers. Manager Reichenbach gave a particularly good program, and turned in over $1,200. It was a worthy cause, and Bridgeport people crowded Poli's to the limit.

Manager Walter T. Murphy, of the Lyceum Theater, New London, Conn., gave a benefit performance at his vaudeville and picture house this week, and sent about $310 to Dayton, Ohio.

Manager Al. V. Rosenberg, of the Rockland Theater, Rockland, Me., has given over his theater for April 14, 15 and 16, to the Universalist Society, which is to give a performance of its own.

S. W. Pollack, who formerly owned the Lyric Theater, Natick, Mass., writes from Europe that he will return to Boston the first week in May. Mr. Pollack is making a thorough European trip, and is seeing all the sights. F. H. Wotton, the present owner of the Lyric, is doing a very nice business with photoplay programs.

On Sunday, April 6, for the first time in the history of Salem, Mass., the moving picture theaters were open. Mayor Hurley gave special permission, and established a precedent by permitting three of the photoplay theaters to open for a benefit performance for the Ohio flood sufferers' fund. Every cent taken in at the box offices of the Salem, Federal and Cozy theaters was given to the fund. Now that the precedent has been established, the Salem exhibitors should try to get Mayor Hurley to grant them licenses for every Sunday night.

HENBY.

LOUISVILLE.

MOVING picture patrons have seen nothing new in Louisville recently. With transportation facilities northward and eastward crippled, as a result of the floods, few new films have arrived in Louisville of late, and exhibitors have been thrown on their own resources. Emergency films of all descriptions have been dug up and handed out to patrons. By exchanging these subjects, the managers of houses got through the worst of their troubles fairly well, none being forced to close down because of a scarcity of pictures. One or two new features found their way into Louisville in some way, and these helped out wonderfully. One or two exhibitors resurrected films dealing with Ohio in some shape or other, and these proved immensely popular, with Dayton the center of national attention. Railroads are now getting trains through and the worst is over. The picture famine is fast being relieved, and exhibitors are able to give their patrons some brand new reels.

While motion picture men of Louisville suffered indirectly from the flood, those of New Albany, Ind., just across the Ohio River, were less fortunate. The Ohio rose to the highest point it has attained in years, resulting in the shutting off of power in the Indiana city. This meant that every motion picture house in New Albany was forced to shut down. This suspension came on Sunday, March 30, one of the best days of the week, and cut in heavily on receipts. The cessation of activities was short-lived, however. Repairs were made and with the water receding, exhibitors again got into action, the loss being confined to a single evening.

Union operators and musicians are returning to work in Louisville, replacing the non-union men who manipulated the machines after the beginning of the strike. The non-union men seemed to be satisfied with this arrangement, receiving a couple of weeks' pay as a bonus. The old operators are taking hold where they left off several months ago, and the situation is in good shape in every essential.

Shubert's Masonic Theater in Louisville has been given over to motion pictures during the past week, "Cleopatra" holding the stage there for six days. Helen Gardner appeared to splendid advantage in the six-reel subject, and the combination drew big crowds. Twenty-five cents was the admission price.

The Colonial Amusement Company, of Lexington, Ky., has adopted a unique method of stimulating attendance at its two houses in that city. The company has issued coupon books, containing thirty five-cent tickets. The books are sold for $1. This means that children's tickets to the theaters cost 3⅓ cents, those of adults costing 6⅔ cents. While officers of the Colonial believe the plan a good one, many of the most astute exhibitors in the State frown on such methods. It is safe to say that such a plan will never gain wide favor in the Bluegrass State, especially in Louisville, where the business is on a higher plane than ever before.

"The Princess" has been the name selected for the new motion picture house at Russellville, Ky. Out of 1131 names submitted in the prize contest, 151 contained the title adopted. One hundred and six persons suggested the "Palace," while "Wonderland" ran a close third, with 68 exponents. Walter Starks was the first person to suggest "Princess," and will receive a season pass to the new house. The contest aroused much interest, and assisted in introducing the new theater to the Russellville public.

The Princess Theater, of Hopkinsville, Ky., recently celebrated its first anniversary, carnations being presented to every patron. A special program was presented, including several added features. The Nashville Trio, a musical act, was included, and scored heavily. The house was suitably decorated, and unusually big crowds more than made up for the extra expense of the occasion. It is planned to celebrate future anniversaries in even more elaborate style.

Manager Otto Brown, of the Manring Theater, of Middlesboro, Ky., has completed plans for extensive improvements in his house, to take place during the coming summer. Box seats are to be added, while the stage will be extended backward and will be made broader. The house will be closed down temporarily.

Work has begun on the big new motion picture house to go up at Pikeville, Ky. The Sam Saad Mercantile Company is the projector of the new house, which will have a seating capacity of 800. The theater will be 40 x 100 feet, cement blocks being used largely. Vaudeville will be mixed with motion pictures, according to present plans.

The Empress Theater, at Central City, Ky., has changed hands, the Consolidated Theaters Company selling to the Empress Theater Company, formed to take over the house. The Empress is a new theater, being erected only recently by the Consolidated. G. L. Small is at the head of the new company which now owns the house. The transfer has caused the National Moving Picture Company, of Louisville, to decide not to build at Central City as originally intended. The National has announced that the first of the theaters it intends to build will go up at Crescent Hill, in the eastern section of Louisville. Plans have been completed, providing for the erection of a building 50 by 200 feet, with a seating capacity of 600. The structure will contain two stores, as well as the theater. Work will begin at once and the theater will be ready for the public about June 10. Moving pictures will be shown, according to plans of officers of the National, which is a new corporation.

A. C. Dinglestedt, owner of the Norwood Theater, in Cincinnati, O., will erect another big theater at Main and Mills avenue in that city shortly. The new house will contain 1,000 seats. Mr. Dinglestedt is now in Columbus, O., protecting the interests of animated picture men during the session of the Ohio Legislature at the capital. Important bills are to be introduced shortly, it is expected.

MIDWEST SPECIAL SERVICE.

SPRINGFIELD, ILL.

PHOTOPLAY circles in Springfield have not buzzed with gossip of new houses for a long time, but rumors of invasion of the association field are now plentiful. The first of the stories to go the rounds was that a good South Fifth Street site had been secured by a group of would-be photoplay magnates, but that their plans were frustrated by a coup upon the part of proprietors W. W. Watts of the Vaudette, and H. T. Loper of the Lyric. These two men, who were using late-run Licensed films, lengthened their shows and divided the entire output of association films between them each week, leaving nothing for a new house, because any additional theaters in Springfield cannot be trailers in the matter of film service. Later came the visits of Dee Robinson, of Peoria, whose photoplay doings have been linked with the exploits of Vernon C. Seaver, and it was reported they had an inclination toward Springfield as the location for a Hippodrome to split the vaudeville time with the big house Mr. Seaver is now preparing in Peoria. They too are using Licensed service.

The Gaiety Theater in Springfield, is very near the end of its vaudeville season, and plans have been made for a summer advent into pictures, but no definite program has been announced. Many see in the latest vaudeville move, developments which may make the Gaiety a permanent picture house, but this is not probable.

Since the Allardts formed their feature film company at Chicago, they are reported to have sold their lease on the Majestic in Springfield, to Martin Beck, and with the coming of Orpheum attractions a fight with the Gaiety, which might have all sorts of consequences, is predicted. It is not likely, however, that the footing of the Western Vaudeville Booking Association here can be loosened.

The warm weather has brought plans for two new airdomes. Frank McGowan and Herbert Woods will open one on South Fourth Street, between Adams and Monroe, it is reported. Woods is a member of the Central Motion Picture Corporation recently formed. A Mr. Bostick is said to have plans for an open air picture show in the north end of the city.

Hints have been dropped that the Musicians' Union is preparing for its periodical onslaught upon Springfield photoplay houses. Just what demand will be made has not been made known, but inasmuch as nearly all the houses are using two or more musicians, any wage increase is likely to be fought.

Lou Harley, who has been organist at the Vaudette in Springfield for some time, goes with Charles Kizer to W. W. Watts' new house in Chicago.

The Y. M. C. A. has been so successful in getting men to attend its Sunday meetings by the use of moving pictures, that Executive Secretary Edwin M. Hill, contemplates purchasing an outfit. Special subscriptions are being received for the purpose.

Moving pictures may be made at the annual meet of the Corn Belt Oratorical and Athletic Association in this city May 6. These will be shown in the eleven cities which comprise the association.

IOWA.

HART BROTHERS, of Clinton, have purchased a site in Second Street, and will erect a new moving picture house which will be known as the "Best." The building will be of brick with a marble and tile front. It is expected to be open some time this summer. Hart Brothers will continue to operate the Colonial in Second Street.

Physical Director Will Jacobsen, of the Clinton Y. M. C. A., is planning to have moving pictures made of the athletic meet of the grade schools in that city early in June.

Charles Miller, of Waverly, has introduced into the Iowa legislature, a bill providing for a municipal theater in each city or town when the citizens so ordain.

The Symphonica Society, of the Williamsburg High School, recently gave over one of its Friday afternoon literary programs to moving pictures. One pupil read a paper, "Films," another gave a recitation, "What Hiram Saw at the Picture Show," and a debate was had upon the question, "Resolved, That a Moving Picture Machine Would be Beneficial to the Williamsburg High School." This was followed by exhibiting two reels of films.

The Majestic, at Cedar Rapids, has added a reel to its show, and is now giving a three-reel performance.

Ida Grove is to have three picture houses. W. L. Hester has leased the Grand Opera House and started a photoplay show, and Wilson Bender has taken a five-year lease on another site.

Proprietor Ludy Bosten, of the Princess moving picture theater, at Muscatine, was the victim of one of the meanest tricks ever played upon a photoplay manager. Someone sent to a number of his best patrons cards reading, "The management of the Princess Theater is very desirous that you discontinue your visits to their playhouse for a time. Your patronage is not solicited. THE PRINCESS." In addition to offering a reward of $50 for the apprehension of the culprit, the management took up the matter with the postal authorities.

The Burt motion picture bill was killed in the Iowa legislature. After a debate, in which members of the house cross-examined each other as to what would shock their modesty, Representative Whitney, of Sioux City, offered an amendment to strike out all reference to censorship and leaving merely the clause that prohibited the showing of pictures that would shock the modesty and senses of the public. This was passed. Representative Burt, the author of the bill, then arose and pleaded that if the members were going this far that they would kill the whole bill, which was cheerfully done.

The American Amusement Company, which owns the Palm and Crystal theaters in Davenport, has taken over the Lyric and converted it into a moving picture house. A new $5,000 Rudolph Wurlitzer pipe organ has been installed. The house was opened with a concert by Petersen's Band. Among the attractions played under the new management was the featuring of some films taken in Davenport. The company has installed a Wurlitzer flute combinola in the Palm.

Harry Downer, superintendent of Friendly House, Davenport, was host to the Tri-City Press Club, the Ben Franklin Club and newspaper men of Davenport, Rock Island and Moline, Ill., at an exhibition of the reel, "The Making of a Great Newspaper," and the pictures of the National printers' home.

Knaack & Son have opened the Princess moving picture theater at Manchester.

MIDWEST SPECIAL SERVICE.

ILLINOIS.

THE voluntary action of so many photoplay house managers in Illinois in giving benefit performances for a fund for flood sufferers is a very cheering index to the class of men who are running the theaters. At Pittsfield, Burr Swan realized $177 in one night for the afflicted. The people of Paris went in great numbers to the "Joy" and helped their neighbors in Terre Haute, Ind., who were visited by the winds and rains. Others who did noble work were Managers Sam Harris, of the Walker, at Urbana; Chris Taylor, of Dreamland and Tabard at Kewanee; W. O. Stevens, of the Eagle at Princeton, and the Majestic, Lyric, Orpheum, Princess and Superba at Freeport.

R. W. Gracie, of Crystal Lake is having plans drawn for a five-cent theater at Barrington. It will cost $10,000.

R. A. Shobe has sold his moving picture theater at Saybrook to Woolley Brothers who own the Saybrook Gazette. A. B. Woolley will be in charge of the photoplay house.

The Celestial at Pekin has announced four reels for five cents, the picture program to give way to regular theatrical attractions.

John C. Kendall, of Pittsfield has purchased a site at Hillboro for a two-story brick building. The lower story will be used as a garage and the upper story for an electric theater.

Bert Hall has opened a moving picture show in the town hall at Chatham and is giving shows Tuesday and Saturday nights. This gives the village two picture houses.

Willis W. Snyder, proprietor of Snyders moving picture theater at Mt. Pulaski, has taken on a piano business as an adjunct to the photoplay business.

Miss Flossie Mitchell is pianist for the new photoplay show which has been opened at Sidney by Edward Epperson and Tasa Dahl. It will give two shows a week.

C. M. Larson and Louis Bornhoeft, Jr., of East Moline have opened a moving picture show at Port Byron, giving performances once a week in the opera house.

The union musician problem has struck Staunton and the theaters were asked to install three-piece orchestras. This is an expensive thing for a small city like Staunton and the manager of the Variety abolished the orchestra and installed a player-piano.

H. H. Johnson, manager of the Lyric Theater at Champaign, was flood-bound in Troy, Ohio, and as his relatives could get no word from him there was an anxious time in Champaign.

The Quincy Chamber of Commerce is actively engaged in the work of attracting new factories and residents, so the Advance Motion Picture Company met a ready response in its proposal to take a series of films in that city. The Quincy exhibition will be made at the Bijou.

A. W. Smith, of the Edison Company, was recently at Edwardsville, where he demonstrated the Edison Kinetoscope at the Electrical Show, and conferred with the Board of Education regarding its introduction into the schools.

The Wiley Amusement Company, of Chicago, has been incorporated with a capital stock of $2,500 to operate moving picture theaters and vaudeville shows. The incorporators are George I. Wiley, Frank W. Lambden and Alec W. Glaskay.

Merchants of two Illinois towns have adopted the plan of giving away tickets to local moving picture houses with all purchases. At Hillsboro the Business Men's Association is co-operating with Ed Fellis of the Hillsboro Opera House, and the customer who buys fifty cents worth, is given a ticket good for any Saturday afternoon. It is not the value of the ticket which is designed to attract the shopper, but the merchants wish to give him a place where he can be entertained while he is resting. The same plan is being followed at Arcola, where the stores are offering coupons which will be honored on Saturday afternoons by the Olympic Theater.

The Columbia Transparency Company, of Chicago, has been incorporated with a capital stock of $5,000 to manufacture and deal in moving picture machines and apparatus. The incorporators are Harold L. De Lisle, Mattias F. Adams and Wilhelmina K. Borgmeier.

Ezra Beers has sold the Princess Theater in South Main Street, at Lewistown to Don Elliott. Elliott has had picture show experience. Beers may return to the road as a traveling salesman.

It is unusual for litigation affecting photoplay houses to develop, but three Illinois managers have had recourse to the courts of justice. At Plano, Edward Thomas, owner of a moving picture show, declared he shoveled a steady stream of coal into the furnace in his building, but all in vain—no heat. After three days of firing he destroyed the lease, and Gus Huth, the lessor, sued to recover rent. The jury could not agree. The roof of the Bijou at Kewanee leaked, and August and Edward Felton and Frank Greenway ould not agree with the owner of the building, Frank F. Whiffen, on the rental settlement. He sued for $200, but a jury gave judgment for only $50. Manager Charles Nelson, of the star moving picture house at Rockford, objected to two uniformed city firemen coming in at the stage entrance as it might create a panic. He was fined $5 for not permitting firemen to make a regular inspection.

The Waverly Theater Company, of Chicago, has been incorporated with a capital stock of $15,000 to operate places of amusement. The incorporators are John G. Campbell, John D. Peterson, and Jacob L. Fox.

The Aurora Amusement Company, of Aurora, has been incorporated with a capital stock of $10,000 to operate theaters, moving pictures, etc. The incorporators are: William C. Flannigan, William J. and Mae Mullen.

The committee appointed by the Decatur high school to make up suitable programs has not lacked an assortment. Here is the selection for six programs which will show with what ease the moving picture machine may be applied to school work: 1. Legend of King Midas. Cotton Industry in the South. The Wright Brothers' Aeroplane. 2. Alice in Wonderland. A Man in the Making. Modern Naples. 3. Cinderella. Aross the Isthmus in 1912. The Fly Pest. 4. The Prince and the Pauper. Lost in the Alps. Christopher Columbus. 5. Return of Ulysses. The Street Beautiful. Evolution and Life of a Silkworm. 6. Robin Hood. The Discoverers (Indians). Spring Log Driving.

The Havana Theater at Havana, gave a benefit performance for the P. E. O. Club, when Mrs. Fannie Spaits Merwin, a prominent Illinois educator, lectured at the exhibition of "The Little Minister." Other benefit performances linked with public movements were those by the Star at Pecatonica and the Princess at Alton. The former aided two classes from the Congregational Sunday School in fattening a new church building fund and the Alton house turned over its proceeds to the Foster Township Hard Roads Association.

Bloomington does not want Sunday theaters. The voters said so by a vote of 3,073 to 2,692.

The United Evangelical Church at a conference at Chadwick declared in favor of having moving picture shows closed on Sundays.

ANNOUNCEMENT

THE FIREPROOF FILM COMPANY is prepared to accept orders and make contracts for motion picture film guaranteed to be superior to the best on the market.

Manufactured by

Fireproof Film Company
Rochester, N. Y.

A FORERUNNER:

The Announceoscope

American, Canadian and all foreign patents applied for. Another J. H. Genter's invention. It will earn thousands of dollars yearly for exhibitors. On the market within 10 days. What it is: An announceoscope is a machine that is attached to the wall regardless of distance from the operator's booth, regardless of distance from a small sub-frame. It announces the title of the picture running during the run of the picture. It announces the vaudeville act during the run of the said act. It tells the exact time of the day. It also carries any advertisement you desire to use, earning for you anywhere from 20 to 50 dollars weekly. It requires no attention. It's automatic in all its arrangements. It in no way interferes with your regular program. It is controlled automatically by the operator or the manager. Cuts and further description will follow in next week's issue.

MIRROROIDE agents write at once. As all machines will be placed through distributors, we will naturally give our agents full preference. No demonstration machine will be distributed free. This machine will completely revolutionize the business. It's the result of over two years' effort and personal attention of J. H. Genter. This machine will be manufactured by the J. H. Genter Company, controlling the pending patents on MIRRORAIDE. The merits of this invention must be seen to be appreciated, as it is the one best bet any exhibitor ever had and it's a sure winner.

THE J. H. GENTER CO.

LICENSED FILM STORIES

LUBIN.

BACK TO PRIMITIVE (April 21).—A water company desires the Mojave Indians' right to a strip of land in Arizona. The big chief refuses to sign with the company's agent without the approval of his son, Brave Eagle, who is attending an Eastern college. The Indians trust Brave Eagle. He refuses to sign, and agents are sent to him to change his mind. Failing in this, they introduce a young woman to win his love and influence him to sign the paper. Her purpose accomplished, she spurns the Indian, and he sees he has been duped. In frenzy, Brave Eagle adopts the red man's way. He captures the adventuress and takes her to his tribe, where she is made to do hard work like a squaw. After a time Brave Eagle bids her return to her people, but in the meantime she has fallen in love with him and asks to be his wife, whereupon the Indian spurns her as she once spurned him.

A SLIGHT MISTAKE (April 22).—Hubby decides that for once he will quit the club and dine with his little wife. The boys ridicule him, but he goes nevertheless. He has been a bad boy, and repents of it on the way. Arriving home, he hears another man urging his wife to elope. Hubby bursts in and attacks the man, whom he throws out the third-story window. The man is not killed, but catches on a shutter. Hubby begs his pardon, because he got in the wrong flat. His wife, on the floor above, is delighted to see him.

SUNSHINE SUE (April 22). — Everybody has a grouch on Friday at the Bronson office. Bobby hates to get up, and his mother pours a pitcher of water over him. When he gets to the office he salutes the bookkeeper, who does not answer. Presently the clerk arrives. He again says good morning, but the others are dumb. The bookkeeper points to the clock and the clerk growls. Bobby has a run-in with the scrubwoman and throws things about. Bronson is late leaving home, and a man with a ladder bumps into him. Bronson knocks the man down, and a policeman comes to arrest him. Bronson gives the cop a five and rushes to the office. The typist arrives late, and she gives a letter to the boss which reads: "Please get another typist. I was married last night." Bronson is crazed; he 'phones to the employment agency and they send a Miss Prim, who proves to be absolutely incompetent. The boss fires her. Finally another typist arrives; she is a pretty little doll. She immediately proves her ability. Everybody waits upon her. The boss is restored to good humor, and as the day ends all bid her a cheery good night. Bobby, left alone, goes to Sue's vacant chair and pats it, smiling.

THE SCHOOL PRINCIPAL (April 24). — Mabel Montressor is the usual spoiled and pampered daughter of wealthy parents. After turning down her parents' choice of a husband she shocks them by announcing she wants to be a school teacher. In John Strong, the principal of the school, Mabel meets her Waterloo. Upon her refusal to work along lines laid down by him, he discharges her. When she thinks it over she knows in her heart that John Strong did right. She becomes lonesome for her "bad boys" of the school, and one day she wanders in the neighborhood. Tommy Moriarty, her worst boy, has been suspended by the principal. Mabel meets him and goes home with him. At the Moriarty home she gets in a mix-up with Mrs. Moriarty, a doctor, the principal, "the stork" and Mr. Moriarty. John Strong escorts her home late that night and she learns that he has missed her ever since she left the school.

DIAMOND CUT DIAMOND (April 25).—John Sargent, a young engineer, and Paul Atwood, an unscrupulous newspaper owner, both love Bella Winton. She has a young sister, Jo, who is in love with Sargent. Atwood is unsuccessful with both girls. Atwood schemes to get Sargent in a gambling den, have the place raided, and print it all in his paper. The scheme works, and Sargent is disgraced. Bella scorns him, but Jo does not. Sargent finds Atwood and thrashes him. Atwood accuses John of attempted murder and has him put into prison. Jo resorts to a scheme to get Sargent out. She pretends she likes the reporter who duped Sargent, and gets him to dress as a burglar and show her how thieves work and how to defend herself. She slips some jewels in his pocket and then calls the police. When the police come she makes him sign a confession of his deeds against Sargent. He squeals on Atwood, and Atwood is arrested. Sargent is liberated and Bella forgives him, but Jo is now his choice.

THE BIRTHMARK (April 26).—Charles King, a sheriff, starts out to capture Black Jack, a bandit. In the fight the bandit's little son is wounded and Black Jack escapes. The boy is adopted by the sheriff, who finds that the lad has a birthmark on the left shoulder. Black Jack is arrested in another county and sentenced to fifteen years. His son grows up and knows only the sheriff as his father. After many years Black Jack returns to get even with the sheriff. Thinking his own boy is the sheriff's son, he captures the lad, but is seen by the sheriff's daughter, who tells her father. In a lonely cabin Black Jack is about to kill the boy, when the birthmark reveals that it is his own son. Black Jack's halfbred pal pulls a gun to kill the lad, but the bandit steps between them and receives the bullet in his own body. The sheriff and daughter arrive as the bandit expires, and the sheriff promises him not to tell his son who his father was.

THE END OF THE QUEST (Special—2 reels—April 25).—Rosa and Pietro live in a village in Italy. They are of poor circumstances, but their love for each other compensates them. One day the village is visited by a bright, well-dressed young Italian from New York. This newcomer, Guiseppe Rocco, sees Rosa, is struck by her beauty and resolves to steal her. One day he gets an opportunity and he makes love to her, drawing glowing pictures of life in New York and promising to marry her before he goes back. One night she steals away with Guiseppe, leaving a note for Pietro, telling him that she has gone and to forgive her. When Pietro returns he swears revenge. He gets his few belongings together and follows them to America. There he begins to hunt down Rosa and Guiseppe, but he discovers that New York is a much bigger place than he dreamed of, and after hunting for many days gives up the quest. He gets a position as a barber.

Two years pass. One evening on the street, going home, he notices a woman staggering along with a baby in her arms. He goes to her assistance and is astonished to recognize Rosa, now changed by sickness and misfortune. Guiseppe had cast her off. Pietro takes her back to his lodgings and does all he can to nurse her back to health, but she dies, giving her baby girl into his charge to bring up.

Four more years pass without getting any trace of the other man. He prospers in his business and is now the owner of the barber shop. One night as Pietro is preparing to close up shop, a knock is heard upon the door and he opens it, to see a fellow countryman. Pietro admits him and he describes how he is a rich merchant and is being hunted down because he will not pay tribute to the Black Hand Society. He is planning to run away, and he wants Pietro to shave off his beard. This Pietro agrees to do, and then, looking into his face, recognizes Guiseppe. The quest is ended. He discloses himself to the man and tells him how he has waited years for this. Then, just as he is about to stab him, the door opens and the little girl comes in, calling "Papa." It stops his hand and prevents the foster father taking the life of the real father. He fights the mental battle and decides to let the other go. But Guiseppe does not move. Pietro goes to him and finds the shock to his heart has been too much—he is dead. Pietro and the little girl fall upon their knees in prayer, and the vision of Rosa appears to him and smiles in appreciation.

THE MAGIC SHOES (April 10).—Through a mistake in "dummying" up the issue dated April 5, the synopsis of the Lubin comedy was placed under the heading of Selig instead of its proper heading. This error was not noticed until that issue was off the press. Although the subject is listed properly in the "Licensed Release Date Page," and in the "Licensed Calendar," we deem it advisable to call the error to the reader's attention in this department.

ALAS! POOR YORICK! (April 21). — In the grounds of a sanitarium are gathered a number of mentally (but harmless) deranged patients. The most conspicuous is a tall tragedian. When he escapes from his keepers the superintendent concludes that he will naturally make his way to the theater in search of an engagement. The various managers are notified, and the first man that excites suspicion is Montgomery Irving, a poor actor of the antique type, who honestly and vociferously applies for a position. He does not understand why he is detained without a contract, and is about to pull the house down when the manager receives word that the real "dip" has been recaptured elsewhere.

CANTON, CHINA (April 21).—Another impressive and attractive educational subject of the Selig travel series.

SEEDS OF SILVER (April 22).—Ralph Arnold, a wealthy young clubman, is driving his guests across country when the harness of his tally-ho team breaks and they are forced to go to the nearest farmhouse while repairs are made. His companions are Count de Bragio, an adventurer; Mira Brown and Lucille Wood (two society birds hunting a fortune), and several social chaperons. Ralph meets Dorothy Ogden, a simple unspoiled beauty. Of course the artful Mira does all she can to drive off this fresh young beauty, but Ralph listens to the call of the heart and finally marries Dorothy Ogden. The blood-sucking men who have lived on his bounty are loath to lose him, and the Count de Bragio, his false friend, lures him on with cards, with wine and with women to shake the charm of poor, lonely, modest little Dorothy, his wife, and finally, by stock tricks, manipulated the market against him and captured the greater part of his fortune. Then the young man comes to himself. They desert the lures of the great city and begin life anew.

DOLLAR DOWN, DOLLAR A WEEK (April 23).—Bill Harcourt and Jim Harcourt, who have always shopped in the country by mail order, come to live in town and conclude to furnish a little flat on the easy payment system. They get out of work and out of money, and the furniture dealer snatches out his goods, leaving them in a bare establishment, barring the fact that each has a pair of pajamas. Their aunt and uncle, from whom they have great expectations, send word that they are coming to visit. Put to their wits' end to make an appearance, they borrow clothes and furniture from the neighboring flat and entertain their relations. The good impression is rudely shattered when the neighbors return suddenly. The neighbor strips the flat bare again and leaves the boys in their "dream robes."

LOVE, THE WINNER (April 23).—The Earl of Ratcliff, in America to retrieve his fallen fortunes, has an invitation to visit his college friend, John Cosgrove. The latter's sister, Mabel, heiress to the large fortune of her godmother, is curious to see a live Earl at close range. The cook and butler go on a hilarious tear the day of the Earl's coming, so Miss Mabel takes advantage of the situation to cook and serve the meal for his highness. He is much impressed with the mien and intelligence of the young lady, and she in turn has her preconceived notions of royal roues quite overthrown. He gives up the thought of marrying for money instantly, but the idea of wedding under his station sticks, so he concludes to leave before he gets helplessly in love. However, he is unable to leave her presence, and he declares that he will marry her.

LOVE IN THE GHETTO (April 24).—Abe Marx, an old second-hand clothes dealer, is so used to making misfits fit that he resents being beaten at checkers by his prospective son-in-law. He takes his daughter's engagement ring from her, but subsequently shows the tenderer side of his nature by giving her a pearl necklace. When Morris Levy learns of the treatment accorded his favorite son, Joe, he is very angry, but Joe's recital is interrupted by a telephone call from the idolizing but perplexed Zetta. He rushes quickly to her, and as the lovers are talking over the exciting events of the day, old Marx returns and adds more trouble by again ordering Joe out of his house and snatching the pearls from his daughter's neck. When Joe Levy gets back home with this recital of fresh indignity his father rushes out to remonstrate with his humble neighbor. He goes to Marx's shop and the quarrel is renewed by the elders with as much gusto as their youngsters make love. While this wordy war rages Zetta steals in and, unobserved by either, picks up the necklace her father dropped in his excitement. After Marx serves a customer he looks for the necklace and, as he cannot find it, immediately charges old Levy with the theft. This starts things. Young Joe, in distress, calls Zetta and she promptly comes to the front with the necklace and such a clever explanation that the family amenities are restored and all is well.

ARABIA TAKES THE HEALTH-CURE (April 25).—Arabia, the feature of a society circus, causes his owner, Essie Fay, disquietude in unmistakable signs of sickness. In conformity with expert advice she concludes to send her pet to a sanitarium, and she relieves old Joe, the negro hostler, of his duty as a rubber-in of liniment. The scene shifts from the circus stable to Dr. Blevin's health resort. Joe comes, leading Arabia, followed by Miss Fay. When she goes into the house to consult with the doctor she is promptly followed by her horse. As the door closes before the horse gets to the threshold of the office, the animal wanders down the corridor of the resort. Seeing a door ajar, the horse noses it open and enters the room of an old maid. Miss Betsy Briggs vacates the premises, and Arabia, curious, opens her trunk and, after emptying it of female apparel, closes the lid and stalks out. Yens Yensen, the window washer, observing Arabia entering a room, falls to the ground in fright, and the horse comes to the window and looks down at him in a mournful way. Sambo Johnson comes slouching down the hall with a tray of food balanced on his hand, which is upset when Arabia rushes at him. On a further tour of inspection the horse picks up the handbag of a nurse and will only give it to her mistress. As a finale the horse takes to her bed and, adjusting a nightcap, signals "Good night."

ESSANAY.

THE UNBURIED PAST (April 22).—The old saying, "that a man never loves but once," proved to be the case with Walter Morris, who was smitten with Margaret Phillips, during his boyhood days. Margaret married a man of wealth. Jack Wright, the husband, soon tired of his treasure and passed many hours with his so-called affinity. Years pass and Walter Morris prospers. In his day dreams he sees his old love. The fast life that Jack led brought about an untimely ending. Margaret wrote to Walter, asking him to come to her assistance and straighten out the estate of her husband. The old love that he had locked in the cell of his heart awakens and he proposes to her. She informs him that the memory of her dear husband could not be cast aside. In examining the papers left on Wright's desk, Morris discovers a diary, which tells in full the double life the former had been leading. Margaret enters, sees Morris with the book and requests him to tell her what it contains. He casts the diary into the grate, where the fatal words that were meant for nobody's eyes but Wright's, were burned to atoms. Morris leaves Margaret under the impression that her husband was all she thought him to be.

THE RIVAL SALESMEN (April 23).—William Jones, salesman, who has been traveling the same territory for twenty years or more, tries to play a joke on a new drummer, which ends by the newcomer turning the tables on him. A fictitious note is handed Jones, stating that John Redmond of Reedville, was in the market for his Fall order, and to see him at once. Jones displays the note promiscuously, which makes the new salesman jealous. Jones informs Brown, the new recruit, that he may call on Redmond for the order, that he is not anxious to get it. Frank Dayton, another drummer, was told the same thing. Both men have a lively time in reaching their destination. Brown wins out, however, when he rescues John Redmond's wife and daughter from a runaway horse. In gratitude Redmond gives Brown his order. What might have been a clever joke, developed into Brown earning a small sum in commission.

CITY OF MEXICO (April 24).—Beautiful Mexico, now topic of every newspaper, is indeed an appropriate subject at this time for an educational and scenic feature. In the few moments that this magnificent picture is exhibited on the screen, the audience will see the Peons, natives of Mexico, scrambling for a few centavos (pennies) their adobe dwellings, market-places, the flower market (Plaza Mayor), the beautiful La Viga Canal, the historical LaNoche Triste (the mournful night tree, under which Cortez wept over his defeat at the hands of the Aztecs,) Further, we are taken by automobile through the different streets, we are then shown the bell tower cathedral, where we get a beautiful bird's-eye view of the city. Next we are shown the national palace and Plaza Mayor. Last, but not least, we are driven up Paseo Avenue to the monument of Guatemozin, the last Aztec emperor.

THE DEACON'S DILEMMA (April 25).—Deacon Jeremiah Green's two sons, Jeremiah, Jr., and Daniel, are the village cutups, and are always getting into trouble and causing friction among the different members of the family. When the new parson arrives in town with his wife and daughter, Jeremiah, Jr., and Daniel, meet them at the railroad station and misinforms them as to the way to Deacon Green's home. Footsore and weary, on the outskirts of the town, they come in contact with a man who is just about to enter a blind pig. Simon Fife, a villageite, sees Parson Brown and comes to the conclusion that he is about to purchase some of the fiery liquid. Brown is given information at the blind pig concerning Deacon Green's whereabouts. That evening at Deacon Green's home, where a surprise party is reigning supreme for the new parson, Simon Fife informs the Deacon of what he saw that afternoon. Parson Brown has a difficult time in explaining his most undesirable situation. Jeremiah, Jr., and Daniel, to make things more interesting, cover the chimney with a large iron plate. The smoke that filled the house a few moments later nearly suffocated the participants in the jovial entertainment. The town constable caught the boys and what he didn't do to them was a caution.

BRONCHO BILLY AND THE RUSTLER'S CHILD (April 26).—David Morgan, a cowpuncher, is informed by Doctor Harding that the former's wife is in a serious condition and must be taken from the high altitude. An Indian horse thief shows David a way to make some money easy. That night, the Indian and the cowpuncher steal two horses. The Indian is captured by Broncho Billy, the sheriff, and squeals on Morgan. Dorothy, the cowpuncher's child, informs her father that a posse is coming up the road. Morgan instructs his child to say nothing to the men concerning his whereabouts. The cowpuncher crawls into the loft and pulls the ladder up after him. Broncho Billy enters, sees Morgan's wife is in a critical condition and asks the child where her father is. She tells him she does not know. The sheriff, hearing a sound above him, is about to fire his revolver into the loft, when the girl confesses that her father is above. Morgan comes down from his hiding-pace, explains to Broncho Billy that he stole the horses, so that he might take his wife to a better climate. Dorothy pleads with the sheriff to save her father. Broncho Billy makes Morgan get up into the loft, as the posse return to the house. One of the men suggests looking into the loft above. They lift Broncho Billy up. He informs his men that there is nobody up there. Later Broncho Billy mails the cattle owner a check for the two horses. Morgan, his wife and child, leave for a better country.

A biting frost comes on and the dancers leave to protect the orange trees with smudge pots. The girl, wandering disconsolate, comes upon a still. On the letter is the revenue offer. She gives the location to the secret service, gets the money and gives it Bob. Another relative suddenly breaks in and the young couple are constantly interrupted in their spooning. The relatives pour in thick and fast, all cranks of the first water—one a health crank, another a spiritual medium, etc. The young husband is timid and hates to evict them, but Molly O'Hara, the servant, is equal to the emergency. She decorates her face with cranberry sauce and feigns illness. The relatives mistake her painted face for a contagious disease and make a wild scramble for the front hall where there is a laughable mixup, after which the Witherspoons are left to themselves.

THE HIGH TIDE OF MISFORTUNE—"What Happened to Mary, No. 10" (April 25).—Although Peart had been outwitted by Mary he had not so informed John Craig, so that when he gets a letter telling him to keep Mary out of the way if he wished to earn the reward, he made renewed efforts to find her. John Craig and his son are released on a writ of habeas corpus in their lawyer's charge. They hunt up Peart, who shows them that Mary is masquerading as a Salvation Army lass. They locate her on the docks selling "War Cries." They get her aboard a schooner on the pretext that a seaman is ill. After several days at sea the schooner anchors off Martha's Vineyard. When the opportunity arrives Mary springs on the old servant woman who brings her meals. The woman is bound and gagged and Mary creeps out of the cabin.

In the distance she sees a lighthouse. There is a boat trailing at the stern. She climbs over the side, drops into the little boat and rows to the lighthouse. After hours of exposure she is seen by the light-keeper and rescued.

A SPLENDID SCAPEGRACE (April 26).—Yancey Goree's love of gambling had cost him all of his inheritance and he sold the home of his forefathers to Pike Garvey to get more cash. Goree then lost the proceeds at poker. Pike Garvey's ambitious wife said, "we must now get a feude if we want to be real society folks." Pike Garvey then offered to buy the feud between Abner Coltrane and Goree. Goree consented and the most extraordinary sale ever heard of, the selling of a quarrel, was consummated. Garvey's delight was great when he discovered the man whom he had bought the right to kill was Judge Coltrane, the man who had once sent him to the pen for moonshining. Goree quickly lost his money at gambling. Coltrane found him the next morning, mentally befuddled and entirely unaware of the events of the day before. The colonel had come to call a truce to their feud and to offer him a home. Goree consented. Later in the day they were riding up the mountain to Coltrane's home. Pike was looking through the trees. Goree persuaded the colonel to change clothes with him on the pretext that he wanted to look well when he passed his old home. He received the bullet meant for the colonel.

VITAGRAPH.

MIXED IDENTITIES (April 21).—Edna and Alice, the twins, get positions as stenographers in the offices of Mr. Redman and Mr. Carter. Redman is short and fussy, Carter, stout and nervous. They happen to be friends, and exchange phone confidences about their new stenographers. Both flirt with the girls. Redman invites Alice to dinner and gives this as a reason in refusing Carter's invitation to the Club. Carter, not to be outdone, despatches a note to Edna who has gone home, asking her to meet him at Stanley's restaurant. While he waits, Redman enters the restaurant with Alice. Carter, believing her to be Edna, follows, but they have disappeared into a private dining room. Edna arrives and is perplexed at not finding Carter. She enters and meets him in the hallway, to be accused of having just entered with another man. She denies it. They get a dining room where they enjoy an excellent meal. Alice leaves Redman to phone her mother. Carter leaves Edna to get a cigar. Carter meets Alice they have a scene and separate, angry. Meanwhile, Redman and Edna, tired of waiting, start to look for their partners; they meet, and she ignores him. He leaves her in a huff. The men coming from opposite directions, find the girls together and get the surprise of their lives. Redman picks out Alice by a flower she wears. Explanations ensue, and the four finish dinner with much laughter in Redman's dining room.

GALA DAY PARADE, YOKOHAMA, JAPAN (April 21).—This is a full and comprehensive view of the Business Men's New Year's Day Parade in Japan; when they take account of stock and start anew the efforts of the year. Nothing like it is seen in any other country.

THE MYSTERY OF THE STOLEN JEWELS (April 22).—Lambert Chase, the detective, is on his way to Europe; he is surprised to see a box lowered from a ventilator, leading out to the upper deck. He takes the box, and discovers it contains a set of jewels. He puts them in his pocket, says nothing about them. Later, reports are circulated about the steamer that many articles of value are missing from the staterooms of the passengers. Chase goes to the Captain, confides his suspicions and tells him the incident of the box. They investigate, and locate the ventilator.

They set a guard there, who watches for the reappearance of the thief. Among the passengers are Mr. and Mrs. Carrell, wealthy people, who have with them, their maid, Jane. Chase suspects her of being an accomplice of the thief, whom circumstances point out as Linton, a very suave, refined and cultured rascal; who makes himself verp popular among his fellow-travelers. The maid is quietly arrested and locked in one of the cabins. When the rumor about the thefts being committed, is circulated, he is sympathetic with those who have been robbed, and shows great interest.

In his arrangements for capturing the thief, Lambert Chase ties one end of the string, which was lowered from the ventilator, to a small bell, safely hidden on the lower deck, where he and the Captain await developments. This is done on the last day out, when Chase is certain the thief will get in his best work. His plans are rewarded by hearing the bell ring, then, after a pause, ring again. This convinces them that the thief thinks the string has caught. The Captain and the detective hasten to the upper deck, and there they find Linton striving to pull up the cord. They grab him, and after a search, find his pockets filled with many stolen articles. He is handcuffed.

THERE'S MUSIC IN THE HAIR (April 23).—Ludwig Liebschnitz has it at his finger ends and when he calls upon Iolanthe McSwatt, she listens in rapture to his renditions upon the piano from Wagner. Eagerly she pours out her heart in acknowledgment of his great playing. He proposes to her and she immediately accepts him. He has a rival in Signore Staccato. Music seems to exude from every spear of his massive "bush." Liebschnitz is discarded and he swears vengeance on his rival. He discerns that Signor Staccato's hair is false. He decides to expose him. He writes a letter to Iolanthe, but she says, 'tis false. He pays her a visit, forearmed with a beautiful bouquet of roses, but to his amazement, discovers that Staccato is there before him. He gains admission to the house, sneaks up behind a settee upon which Staccato and his adored one, are sitting. Removing his tie from his collar, he attaches one end to the settee, and the other to a lock of Staccato's hair. When Staccoto throws himself on his knees to declare his love, his wig comes off and reveals his bald head. Iolanthe shrieks in horror and falls into Liebschnitz's arms, vowing that she loves him with all the ardor and fervor of her soul.

THE POWER THAT RULES (April 24).—With an overpowering passion for money to satisfy her love of display and pretension, Rhoda Canfield married Tom Winters with a hope that he might satisfy her ambition and meet her requirements. He is a man of some means, but not wealthy. The first outburst comes when she reads, immediately after her marriage, in the Society columns, that Tom Winters has married Rhoda Canfield, a poor girl, when it was expected that he would marry her wealthy step-sister, Cecilia. She urges her husband to make himself a greater power in the world of wealth. Mr. Mellville, a broker, who is anxious to get Winters to invest his money in a certain stock, notices this ambition and with the assistance of his wife, prompts her to insist upon her husband's investing in Mr. Mellville's offer. They succeed in accomplishing their purpose and Winters puts his all in the stocks.

Mrs. Winters immediately purchases all sorts of finery and prepares to live in accordance with her expected means. Cecilia, sympathizes with Mr. Winters, and tries to reason with her half-sister, and tells her that her husband is doing the best he can and she is foolish to try to make him sacrifice his judgement to her ambitions. Rhoda is in the seventh heaven of delight, when her husband receives the news that his stock has slumped, and he is a ruined man. Upon her return home, she finds her husband in despair. She berates him for being such a miserable failure in business. In the parlor, she meets Cecilia, gives vent to her feelings and repeats what she has told her husband. Cecilia remonstrates with her and tells her she ought to be ashamed of herself to denounce her husband. She points out her error in such powerful words that Rhoda's conscience is awakened, and she falls at Cecilia's feet.

THE STRONGER SEX (April 25).—After heavy loss at the gaming table, Edna Marshall exercises her wiles on Mr. Harold Ainsley, an aged and wealthy American gentleman, whom she meets at an afternoon tea. She does not love him, but she must have money. He proposes to her and they are married. After the honeymoon, her husband's nephew comes to visit them at their home, for a few week's vacation. The young wife longs for younger society. She endeavors to arouse the nephew's love for her and add him to her list of conquests. He resists her charms, and in revenge, she tells her husband that she has been insulted by his nephew. Mr. Ainsley, in anger, calls the younger man to account, and accuses him of violating his confidence. The young man declares his innocence and insists that Mrs. Ainsley be called before them. She appears and when she is confronted by the young man, she confesses her duplicity. Her husband repudiates her and his nephew denounces her. She realizes her great mistake when she finds herself cast off by both men, she is overwhelmed with remorse and shame.

A FIGHTING CHANCE (April 26).—Robert Wynn has a generous income. His wife is a domestic woman, who does her own housework and loves her home above all else. She is very plain and unpretentious, although a handsome woman. Bob is attracted by his typewriter, a very stylish and well-mannered girl. She has never met Mrs. Wynn, and does not know that Bob is married. He makes love to her, takes her out to luncheons, and she is very favorably impressed. She learns that he is married and makes up her mind that she will call upon his wife. She knows his weakness for stylish and well-dressed women, and she tells Mrs. Wynn all about it. She advises Mrs. Wynn that she is unjust and unfair to herself by not making the most of her beauty, and tells her that she has a fighting chance to completely win her husband's love and to teach him a lesson. His wife appreciates Nell's honorable attitude, and together they arrange to prepare for the transformation in Mrs. Wynn's appearance and graces.

Nell makes an appointment with Bob to go to the theater. Mrs. Wynn, dressed in the height of fashion, comes in and takes a seat in the next box, with her back turned toward them. When she enters Bob is busily engaged in talking to Nell and does not see her. After a few moments he is attracted by the woman's stunning appearance and calls Nell's attention to her. She tells him that she is acquainted with the lady, and if he would like to have an introduction she will be pleased to give it. Bob is all eagerness. They step outside the box into the hallway, and Nell calls Mrs. Wynn. She comes out, looks into her husband's face and smiles. He clasps her in his arms and asks her forgiveness.

THE ARTIST'S GREAT MADONNA (Special—2 parts—April 21).—Angelo, an artist, determined to paint a Madonna, goes in search of a model. He meets at the studio of one of his friends a whimsical young lady named Suzette, who offers to pose for him. But at his studio she does not take his actions seriously, jumps down from the model's throne and after throwing a kiss to him runs away. He next meets an old acquaintance, named Toto, at a cabaret show who agrees to pose for him. But as he begins to paint, he discovers that she lacks that Madonna-like expression. He tells her so, and she flies into a rage. She is about to stab him with his palette knife when she is interrupted by the appearane of Marie, sent to Angelo by his friend. Angelo is struck by her beauty and innocent ways and tells her that as soon as she has seen a little of life she wil be his great Madonna. He takes her to a restaurant where they again meet the infuriated Toto. In a jealous rage Toto is about to run a stilleto into the body of Marie, but Angelo receives the wound.

Angelo is carried to his studio where he is nursed back to health by Marie. Later he marries her. Knowing that his wife's looks lack one thing—the humanity of the mother of sorrows—he goes in search of his ideal for his great painting. After five months of unsuccessful searching he returns to his home town where he meets, outside a cafe, his friend, Jim Townsend, who is made acquainted with his fruitless search. After giving vent to his sorrows he again starts on his journey for his ideal.

Through the death of a relative Jim Townsend comes in for a fortune. Determined to help Angelo and Marie, he alls upon her and notes that she is sewing in expectancy of an heir. He buys a little cottage in the suburbs into which he moves her. He then tells her that he will search for Angelo and bring him back. Several months later Angelo comes to Jim's studio still without a model. Jim tells him that he has found his great Madonna and taking him to the new cottage bids him enter wherein he will find what he is seeking. As he opens the door he beholds Marie sitting in the sunlight with a tiny baby in her arms, radiant in the sanctity of motherhood. He is fascinated and reverently kisses her. He brings his easel and begins work on his masterpiece. A short while after they receive a letter from Jim Townsend saying that he is sending the deed for the cottage as a present to Angelo, the younger. Angelo places the deed in the baby's hands and with his arms around Marie looks proudly from his model wife and hild to his finished masterpiece, "The Great Madonna."

WINTER SPORTS AT BODELE (April 22).—This film deals with sports amid the snows in Austria where, every year, there are assembled a number of expert ski jumpers. Down a steep incline these men fly like the wind. They reach the edge of the precipice, sail through the air and, like eagles, drop down at such a speed that a great many of them are unable to maintain their equilibrium and finish the slide with their faces in the snow.

ANCIENT GREECE (April 22).—This series of views includes a picture of all the famous ruins and temples which have made some of the most interesting history that the world has yet known. It is particularly interesting to anyone who has read, or ever intends reading, the history of the Roman Empire or any of the famous Greek literary masterpieces.

THE OUTLAW (April 23).—After being warned to leave the town before midnight, Don Gomez, a known outlaw, is found and thrown into a little western jail. His sweetheart, Delores, interests Bob Preston, an adventurous young miner, in the project of releasing the outlaw. They succeed and Gomez reaches another town. He decides to live an upright life in the future, but his first attempt to secure work meets with refusal. He stoops again to robbery, but is discovered and in the struggle sets the house on fire, by accidentally overturning a lamp, Bob Preston, having decided to return home for a visit arrives at his father's ranch in time to meet Gomez rushing out of the burning building. The outlaw realizes for the first time that it is Bob's father he has tried to rob. He dashes back into the roaring flames and emerges with the unconscious form of the elder Preston. In performing the brave feat, the outlaw is so badly burned that he dies soon after.

THE THWARTED PLOT (April 24).—Equipped with a slight knowledge of medicine, George Jamison is acting as physician in a little mining town. When the opportunity presents itself, he writes to two pals, Joe Brooks and his wife, to come out. They do. A few days later Brooks is taken ill, and the next day he dies; at least so the miners supposed. The funeral is held, but instead of a corpse the casket contains nearly all the gold the town bank held. On the journey to the cemetery the "hearse" is overturned on a steep hill and the "casket," opening, reveals the gold. The driver of the wagon, the only one of the party not in on the plot, hurries back for the miners. "Dr." Jamison and his two pals get away with their lives, but are compelled to abandon the gold.

OUR FEATHERED FRIENDS (April 25).—The mother instinct in animals is always an interesting study. The same is true, but more particularly, of birds because they seem so frail and incapable of defending themselves. In this film an insight into the life and habits of several different families of birds provides both entertainment and knowledge.

A TRIP ON THE SEINE (April 25).—A journey on the famously beautiful river that winds its way through Paris and out to the sea.

THE COUNT'S WILL (April 26).—Count Heinrich Von Baum searches through years of dissipation for happiness, but does not find it until he abandons the old life after meeting Lillian Calvin. The Count's wealth and position soon overshadow the advantages and accomplishments of Lillian's old sweetheart, Tom Hayden. The Count is taken ill and a physician warns him that he can live but a short while. Accordingly, he reunites Lillian and Tom, makes them beneficiaries of his will and, feeling satisfied that he has done one good deed in his useless life contentedly awaits his fate.

AN EXCITING HONEYMOON (Special, 2 parts, April 26).—The wedding of Miss Gwendoline De Vinne and Lord Rowley was an elaborate affair and at the reception following the ceremony the guests are showering the couple with congratulations. Lord Rowley had one drawback. He was very near-sighted. When the more frivolous among the guests realized this condition presented an opportunity for some fun they seized upon it. As the time for catching the honeymoon steamer drew near, Lord Rowley's eye-glasses were lost. One of the guests persuaded the groom to search every place where the glasses were not. Another of the guests busied herself with bribing Lady Rowley's African maid to don the bride's traveling suit and mask the color of her face with a profusion of powder. The plan worked like a charm and Lord Rowley and the counterfeit bride were at the steamer before Lady Rowley discovered that her husband was missing. In an automobile and accompanied by her parents the bride hurries to the steamer. She is just in time—to miss it.

Meanwhile, as the steamer slips out of the slip, the negro maid gets scared. Her voice and language scare the bridegroom and he beats a speedy retreat. But it seems that every time he turns a corner he sees her. Finally, he takes refuge in a ventilator funnel. Peering out he sees her and in his hurry to get back, loses his grip and drops—down into the coal bunkers. When he gets up out of the coal he is a sorry sight.

The real Lady Rowley hires a tug and pursues the fast-disappearing steamer. The little tug makes fine speed and soon the bride reaches the side of the steamer and starts to climb the ladder which is dropped over the side. One of the guests hands her Lord Rowley's glasses. Once in possession of these, Lord Rowley sees the joke, but with his real bride in his arms at last, he should worry.

By this time the lady of color is getting seasick, or, at least, she gives that impression and begs to be allowed to get off. She is afraid to descend the forty-foot ladder from the steamer to the tug; so they use the tug's derrick to lift her off. When the maid is in mid-air the steamer resumes its journey and the counterfeit bride kicks and screams when she sees the ocean yawning beneath her. It is some time before the tug's crew, satisfied with their joke, finally lower the pale-faced African to the deck of the tug where she receives a well-earned monetary reward for her part in "An Exciting Honeymoon."

BIOGRAPH.

THE LEFT-HANDED MAN (April 21).—The thief was clever and he forged around the girl's sweetheart a chain of circumstantial evidence that seemingly had no flaw. The girl's faith was great and in unraveling the mystery the detective she engaged used the scientific methods of today, making a brilliant detective story.

A RAG-TIME ROMANCE (April 24).—This is a very novel conceit of a wedding that took place in dark-town when the rag-time fever was at its height. Everybody ragged, even the furniture.

THE CURE (April 24).—The young lady is an artist, consequently she has a highly artistic temperament and she cannot see her fiance because he is not her ideal. She finds her ideal, however, but in the finish, idealism receives an awful shock.

THE LADY AND THE MOUSE (April 26).—The question is, would the young tramp really have fallen in love with the groceryman's daughter if he had not caught her in the heart struggle. Be that as it may, she could not find it in her to drown the unwelcome visitor to the pantry, so she let it go and the silent little drama witnessed by the tramp greatly impressed him. Not so the strict aunt. She declared the whole thing to be in exact accordance with everything else in the family. Their hearts ran away with their heads. That was why they lost money on credit, could not pay off the mortgage and send the sick sister to a better climate. As for the tramp, they had no business to take him in. He could not pay for his keep. But the tramp surprised them all.

MELIES.

HOW CHIEF TE PONGA WON HIS BRIDE (April 24).—The Maori tribes of Awhitu and Waikatu are at war. Te Ponga, young chief of the Awhitus hears of the great beauty of Puhuhu, daughter of the old chief of the Waikatus, and in order to see her, flies the white flag of truce and pretends to make overtures for peace. The old chief, anxious for peace, receives Te Ponga with great pomp and ceremony and holds a great celebration in his honor at which Puhuhu dances. Te Ponga falls instantly in love with her, and she with him.

That night, through the stratagem of one of Te Ponga's warriors, the young lovers meet clandestinely, and plan to elope on the morrow. Puhuhu returns to her sleeping hut for the night, but Te Ponga and his braves steal to the water's edge, strip all the Waikatu canoes of their paddles and place them in their own.

Next morning Te Ponga takes ceremonious leave of his host, and is honored with the company of all the Waikatu maidens for a short ways from the village. The Waikato men watch the procession from afar, and are aghast when they discover that Puhuhu, instead of returning with her companions, flees with Te Ponga. The old chief's camp is instantly up in arms at the outrage and pursue the fleeing lovers, only to be baffled by Te Ponga's cunning in removing the paddles. The young chief and his bride make a safe get-away in their swift canoe while the furious Waikatus spend their wrath in unavailing imprecations on the shore.

A TRIP TO THE WAITOMO CAVES OF NEW ZEALAND (April 24).—Historic underground cavities renowned because of their wonderful stalactites and stalamites, formed through many centuries by the dripping of water charged with calcium carbonate and other calcareous matter, from the peculiar earth formation above.

KALEM.

THE SNEAK (April 21).—Harry Willis, finding that Elise Dupont does not favor his suit, determines to gain her consent through her young and irresponsible brother, John. John is flattered by the older man's consideration and when Willis invites the boy to accompany him to a gambling resort, he readily accepts.

John loses his money and accepts an I. O. U. proffered by the proprietor. The incident is discovered by Arthur Ballard, a straightforward young man, who stands high in the estimation of Elise, and who hopes to win her hand. Ballard secretly purchases the obligation from the proprietor, but is arrested when the place is raided. Next day he is publicly disgraced and Elise's father forbids him from entering the house.

Willis now believes that his plan is on a fair way to succeed. Again he induces John to visit the resort and this time Willis gives the boy his personal I. O. U. A few days later he insists upon payment and suggests that John take the money from his father's safe. When burglars enter the Dupont home and rob the safe, things look black for John, who has really secured the money from Ballard, but Dolly, the little sister of Elise and John, through an unusual circumstance, exposes Willis' plot and brings about the capture of the burglars. Mr Dupont is brought to a realization of Ballard's sterling qualities and withdraws his objection to the young man's suit for the hand of Elise.

THE SECRET MARRIAGE (April 23).—Jim Wayburne, a civil engineer, goes south to take charge of some railroad construction work. He boards at the home of the Marsons and falls in love with Nelly, Marson's daughter. While the girl is impressed with Jim's manly character, she informs him that she does not love him enough to become his wife.

One day Jim's brother, Ned, arrives for a visit. He is attracted by Nelly's beauty and she falls in love with him at first sight. Ned suggests a secret marriage and induces the girl to visit the office of a justice, where the ceremony is performed. As the days pass Nelly asks Ned's permission to publicly announce the marriage, and he becomes so exasperated that he flies into a passion and starts for the railroad station on horseback, leaving a curt note to Jim, asking that his belongings be forwarded.

Jim has never ceased to love Nelly, and, knowing nothing of the marriage, he harbors the hope that she may change her mind. When he discovers the cowardly note he rides after his brother and discovers to his horror that Ned has been thrown from his horse and killed.

Meanwhile Nelly tells her secret to her parents and they are about to close the door against her when Jim returns with the sad news.

Time heals many wounds and when Jim rescues Nelly in a time of peril, she realizes that he has been destined to protect her through life.

THE PHONEY SINGER (April 25).—When Sammy calls on Helen, he is greatly humiliated to find that Jim, his rival, is presiding at the piano and fascinating the fair one. "If I could only sing and show this fellow up," philosophizes Sammy. A great scheme occurs to him. He secures a phonograph, which an accomplice places through a window and through a well-plan code of signals the "phoney singer" makes a big hit. Helen forgets Jim completely.

But fate plays a cruel trick on Sammy. Jim discovers the scheme and arranges with a policeman to arrest the accomplice as a suspicious character. Then Jim makes the phonograph perform a variety of stunts, which disconcert the pretender and bring about the grand exposé.

JAPAN, THE INDUSTRIAL (April 25).—The tourist is conducted to many interesting places in picturesque Japan. At Kobe we see the Upper Falls of Nunobiki, from which a celebrated mineral water is piped. Proceeding along the waterfront we visit the customs house, the hotels, banks and consulates and arrive at the harbor. In Motomachi, the principal street of Kobe, we notice a novel method of advertising a flower show—and the flowers of Japan are world-famous.

In Kyoto the odd canals intersect the city in all directions and a trip along the Biwa Canal enables the tourist to form some conception of this picturesque country.

THE FIGHTING CHAPLAIN (April 26).—The Reverend John Barlow, a young man of twenty-eight, is minister in a small New England village. Because he believes that a man of peace should not be aggressive, he acquires a reputation for timidity. This is particularly distressing to Marian Wells, a girl in the clergyman's congregation, with whom he is in love. When the minister proposes he is told by Marian that she can only marry a brave man.

President Lincoln issues his call for volunteers and Marian's father recruits a company which leaves for the front with Barlow as chaplain. In a terrific battle Captain Wells is dangerously wounded and Barlow drags him to safety, unmindful of the rain of bullets. Marian arrives on the scene to nurse her father and one day when most of the troops have left to reconnoiter, a large band of guerillas sweeps down upon the almost defenseless camp to pillage and slaughter. The Chaplain directs the construction of a crude barricade and when he sees that the defenders are about to be annihilated, he plunges fearlessly through the guerillas and makes his way to a stable tent, where he secures a horse and dashes after the soldiers. Under the leadership of the Chaplain the troops return to camp and after a desperate battle the marauders are put to flight. Sweeter to the ears of the Chaplain than the cheers of his comrades is the soft voice which assures him of his future happiness.

She is engaged to be married to Terry O'Rourke, a motorman on the street cars, when Weinersteiner meets her and falls in love with her. He wants to see Norah home, but she declines. He follows her out and sees that she is met by Terry. The Dutchman gets angry and goes to his register to find out where Norah lives. He arrives at Norah's house while Dan has gone out for a "growler" of beer. Norah's mother thinks that something has gone wrong at the office when Weinersteiner makes himself known to her. He soon reassures her and makes himself at home. Dan returns with the beer and trys to hide the can when he sees the fat Dutchman. His wife tells him who he is. Then the Dutchman makes himself solid with Dan by giving him cigars, etc. Very soon Dan and the Dutchman are on good terms and he sides with the Dutchman for Norah's hand, while the mother is very indignant, and takes the side of Terry, who is forbidden by Dan to come any more to the house. Thus matters stand until St. Patrick's Day. The family are all dressed up in their best when Terry comes in, and as it is St. Patrick's Day, Dan has to shake hands with him. The mail arrives with a box of Shamrocks from Ireland. Dan opens the box and they are all deeply affected when they see it and each take a spray and kiss it reverently. The Dutchman enters and greets each effusively. Then he spots the Shamrock, and to the horror of the others, he puts pepper and salt on it and eats it. Dan, Terry, the mother and Norah throw him out of the window.

THE DRAGON'S BREATH (April 24, 2 reels.)—Phillip, the newly elected president of a college, is a man of great strength of character and purpose, and discovers in Lois his ideal of womanhood. Returning from his honeymoon he commences to keep a diary, making entries day by day.

One entry reads: "I have married the most wonderful woman in the world," and he says through his school he will send out into the world the most wonderful set of men that a college has ever produced. His love for his wife increases every day, and he writes how, when a Chinese servant is sick, his devoted wife visits the Chinese quarter and nurses the sick man. He does not know that owing to that visit his wife has smelled opium, and, out of curiosity, smokes some. She finally becomes hopelessly addicted to the drug. Knowing that she cannot give it up and truly loving her husband, she decides to leave him. Placing her hat and coat on the banks of the river he is led to believe that she has committed suicide.

He is broken-hearted at the supposed death of his wife, and works harder than ever, and is one day made governor of the state. His wife's sister, Grace Carlisle, is in love with him, but he only loves his dead wife. On the day he is elected governor, a poor, dirty, ragged woman knocks against Grace Carlisle in the crowded square in front of the City Hall, and to her horror she recognizes her sister. Grace follows her to a den in the lowest part of the city and begs her not to let Phillip know she is alive as it would ruin him. Grace, however, decides to shatter Philip's ideal in the hope that he will marry her, and going to Phillip, tells him his wife is alive and offers to take him to her. They go, and to his horror he finds his wife in a filthy opium den, dying. In spite of all he loves her still and she dies in his arms.

THE WAYWARD SISTER (April 27).—Jim Hollis, the son of a wealthy stock broker, goes on a visit to his chum, Henry Ward. At Henry's Home, he meets Nan Ward, Henry's sister. They become engaged. Nan receives a letter from her wayward twin sister, Katherine. She decides not to tell him of her sister's existence. Jim is called home on business. He greets his father and shows him the picture of his fiancée. Unfortunately, Jim sees Katherine in the company of several notorious people. Thinking it is Nan, he is heartbroken and stubbornly refuses to speak to her. Several months elapse in which Jim is on the downward path. Nan in the meantime has received a letter from her wayward sister, asking her to come and see her. She and her brother leave for the city. Jim sees Katherine in an automobile, jumps on behind and follows Katherine to her home. He comes to her thinking it is Nan, is about to kill her when Nan and her brother come in. Jim is thunder-struck. Explanations are made and all ends happily.

FORGETFUL FLOSSIE (April 17).—Flossie was of a forgetful turn of mind. She has two gentlemen friends, Chester and Joe. They both call on her, Joe being there first. Chester arrives and Joe determines to go. Flossie walks with him to the hallway and absent-mindedly gives him Chester's coat. She forgets all about Chester, who is sitting in the parlor, and walks out with Joe. They walk about a block and then Joe discovering Chester's overcoat, they return. Chester meanwhile has been impatiently waiting Flossie's return. She enters with Joe and he gets the right overcoat. He leaves, this time alone. Chester proposes to Flossie, is accepted, and he gives her a ring. The next day she is out walking with him. Chester goes across the street to mail a letter and Joe passes in his auto. She calls him and they ride away together, forgetting completely that Chester ever existed. Joe, after taking her home, proposes to her and she accepts. He goes to put a ring on her finger when he notices the other. Chester enters at that moment and explains to Joe's chagrin, that the forgetful girl is his promised bride. They go to the minister and are married. She forgets who she is married to and kisses the minister, much to that reverend gentleman's consternation. However, Chester determines that he can cure her of her forgetfulness and all ends well.

A JOKE ON THE SHERIFF (April 17).—The widow, Floss, is friendly with the sheriff. Claude, a bedraggled tramp, calls at her house and asks for something to eat. She offers him some freshly cooked pie, if he will chop some wood. As soon as she has gone, he takes the pies and runs away. The widow sees him and follows him with a shotgun. She catches him and marches him to the sheriff's office, where he is formally arrested. He is sentenced to thirty days in jail, and is the jail's only inmate. The sheriff takes pity on him, after a few days and gets friendly with him, giving him tobacco, and other luxuries. He discovers that Claude can play poker and arranges a game. Claude induces the sheriff to loan him a dollar to make the game interesting. Claude wins all the money that the sheriff had. He makes the sheriff buy him a new outfit and borrows his shaving outfit. The sheriff waxes angry and throws him into his cell. However, he leaves his keys hanging conveniently in the lock. Meanwhile, the widow calls and brings the sheriff delicacies. Claude lets himself out of the cell and goes to the sheriff's office. The widow is attentive to him and the sheriff gets angry. After she leaves he orders him out of his jail. Claude goes, and passes the widow's house. She invites him in. He becomes friendly with her and proposes marriage. The sheriff, then deciding to visit her, starts on his way. He arrives just in time to see the minister binding the knot and leaves in chagrin.

BILLY THE SUFFRAGETTE (April 25).—Billy is a bright young man—at least Ada thinks so, and she ought to know, for they have been secretly engaged for some time. Aunt Cockle does not altogether approve, for she has suffragette leanings and does not believe in spooning.

The deacon calls and he and Mrs. Cockle talk about the suffragettes and Billy is sent about his business for objecting to Ada wearing a pretty sash with "Suffragette" on it.

Mrs. Cockle, noting the presence of the famous Mrs. Spankhurst in an adjoining town, writes inviting her to call and meet the Suffragettes in town. She gives the letter to Ada to post. Ada meets Billy and tells him the import of the letter and Billy gets an idea and purloins the letter. Billy accepts the invitation in the name of Mrs. Spankhurst, and in due time Billy, dressed in the most approved Suffragette style, arrives by train and is met by the deacon, Mrs. Cockle and Ada. Things happen quickly and alarmingly. The Suffragette person has a good stiff drink and smokes a cigarette and flirts with the deacon, and finally stating she is tired, locks herself in Mrs. Cockle's room for forty winks.

Mrs. Cockle is at her wits' end and begs Billy, by letter, to come and put her out. Billy, who has escaped by the window, issues terms. He will do it if Aunt Cockle agrees to his immediate marriage with Ada. Mrs. Cockle capitulates and Billy arrives. He goes into the room where the supposed Suffragette is resting. After much noise Billy announces to the family that the Spankhurst person has departed. He gets Ada.

BOOBS AND BRICKS (April 21).—John Bodkin and Jasper Raggout were suitors for the hand of the belle of Podunk. Very well, that made them natural enemies. The belle in question, however, favored neither, but chose to bestow the glory of her smile on little Fred Putnam.

One day there came to town a charmingly dressed and very handsome "saleslady." John and Jasper, along with the rest of Podunk's male population, followed her around, while the female contingent elevated their noses steadily upward. The beautiful Miss was hard up, evidently, for she showed a telegram copy of her wire East for the trifling sum of $1,000 for expenses. Enough! John Bodkin and Jasper Raggout dug into their respective hoards, borowed from every gentleman of Podunk and placed the net proceeds in the fair hands. She gave them her suit-case, and with instructions as to directions, John and Jasper made way down the road. Meanwhile the heartless fair one paid her board bill and left. Later, with an empty suit-case and three paving stones in their lap, John and Jasper no longer wonder why ladies' apparel weighs so much.

WHEN JIM RETURNED (April 24).—Jim had been away a long time. Pretty Marjie dressed herself in her very best when she heard that the boys had gone to the station to bring home the college chap. Jim arrived, climbed into a ranch outfit and felt at home once more. The boys decided to give him a party. This was the inspiration of Chick, who confided it to his sweetheart, Polly. And Polly hurried off to Marjie, who in turn designed a little affair of her own. All would have gone well if Jim, in his exuberant spirits, had not kissed Polly when Chick chanced to be around. Chick objected and started to queer the party. The result was that Chick was lassoed, thrown in a corral with a vicious ram, with dire results to himself and amusement to the others.

CALAMITY ANNE'S TRUST (April 26).—Calamity hauled her burro through a stream just in time to see Sad Eyed O'Brien put a pistol to his head, but too late to save him. Result—a will was found in which Calamity was asked to take charge of O'Brien's pretty daughter. Calamity did, leaving all the love of her big heart on the orphan child.

Calamity's particular forte in life thereafter was to protect her ward against cowpunchers. She wanted that ward to marry a "Dook" or prince, or somebody that Calamity had vaguely heard about. Hence, when handsome John Wengle made advances, Calamity started for him with her six-shooter. In fact, every time that Calamity went abroad she had occasion to use that six-shooter, for all the boys were hard after that ward.

One day came a daintily dressed, snappy-looking little chap, arrayed in the city's latest. What the cowboys did to him was a scream, until Calamity interfered and dispersed them. And Calamity had an idea—why not marry her ward to this evidently prosperous youth. She tried—love blossomed without effort, but the young couple, unaware of Calamity's desires, were too much afraid of her. So they rushed off to a neighboring town and had the job done.

Meanwhile, the stage stopped and an elderly, well-dressed gentleman from the city alighted. The half-dozen cowboys eyed him curiously, and when he carelessly threw his suit-case toward them to carry, they let it drop and stared at him. Calamity and he met—met, when he found Calamity fast asleep in a doorway, with a note announcing the elopement in her hands. Thus papa quickly learned what had happened to his Angel Boy and aroused Calamity roughly. This almost cost him his life, but after explanations, Calamity took a strong liking toward the city man. After a bit the wayward couple returned and all was rejoicing in Calamity's hut and all was sorrow in the corral.

MAJESTIC.

PEDRO'S REVENGE (April 13).—Mr. Bernard, a fruit grower, is short of help, so two tramps are put to work with other fruit pickers. The tramps work part of the day and then start a flirtation with one of the girl fruit pickers. Pedro, the girl's lover, gets jealous and attacks the tramps. Bernard sees the fight and orders the tramps and Pedro to come to the house and he will pay them off. At his house, Bernard discovers that he has very little cash, so writes a check and asks his daughter, Dot, to drive to town and cash it. The trmps see her start off with the check and plan to rob her when she returns from the bank. The tramps, while waiting her return, spend their money for drink while Pedro hunts for work at another fruit ranch. Dot is on her way home when the tramps attack her and are about to take the money when Pedro comes to her rescue. The tramps beat him senseless, but Dot escapes and runs to an empty barn. They pursue her; Pedro recovers and runs for help. Dot hears the tramps coming. She runs up the steps, opens a trap door and enters the loft. The tramps try to force the trap door open and find it useless, so one of them tries to enter by way of the hole above the manger. Pedro has reached the fruit ranch and tells of Dot's danger. Bernard, with posse, starts out to rescue. Dot finds she can't guard both entrances to the loft so backs to corner and holds the tramps at bay with pitchfork. The rescue party arrives in time. Pedro is rewarded.

I LOVE YOU (April 15).—David Wilde is saved from drowning by little Betty Grey, daughter of a Florida fisherman. She has her father bring him to their cabin where he is cared for until fully recovered.

David and Betty become great friends. They go for long walks on the shore and often, when they stop to rest, David writes the words, "I love you," in the sands.

Then the time comes when the boy feels the call of his own kind and knows he must return to the city. He bids the girl boodbye and promises to come back—some time.

Days pass. Betty waits for a letter from David—but it never comes. She does not know he has forgotten her and is engaged to his old sweetheart, until one day, she reads that he is at a local hotel, visiting his intended bride and her parents.

Heartbroken, Betty tells herself that it is not true. She rushes to the hotel and there witnesses a love scene between David and the rich girl he is to marry. She needs no further proof. With dragging feet and aching heart, she starts to return to her cabin.

And in the sands she comes across the words, "I love you," written by her lover who forgot. Falling on her knees, she flings herself across them and sobs out her grief—alone!

VIEWS OF PISA—The Leaning Tower of Pisa (April 15).—These include views of the world-famous leaning tower, built in 1174 and shows the great tower bells, the largest of which weighs six tons; the Baptistry, Cathedral, built in 1063, S. Maria Della Spina and other interesting features of Italy's most interesting city.

THANHOUSER.

THE DOG IN THE BAGGAGE CAR (April 13).—The actor and his wife suddenly found themselves "at liberty" because the manager of their attraction had flittel unexpectedly. They wanted to get back to New York, but even though they sold all their wardrobe they could only arrange sufficient funds to pay for one ticket. The woman, however, had an inspiration: the railroad company carried baggage free. The thespians had no baggage, therefore she decided to ship her husband in a Saratoga trunk in the baggage car ahead. He consented to the plan. The plan was marvelously successful, and the husband was trundled aboard the train without arousing any suspicion. His wife found new troubles, however, for the heartless conductor refused to let her take her little pet dog into the passenger car.

The baggage master was a sour person, who hated everybody, even dogs. Called out of the car for a moment, he returned to find that most of his lunch had vanished. He blamed it on the dog. Later his cigar was smoked by some scoundrel, and again he blamed the dog, becoming so enraged that he finally hurled the helpless animal into the outer darkness between stations.

The woman was very angry when she learned the fate of her dog. Being bright she suspected the cause of the trouble and extracting her baggage from the waiting heap she removed her husband from the trunk and ordered him to devote his time to searching for "Tootsie." The last heard of them the wife was at a railway station waiting on a trunk, the husband was down the road whistling for a dog, while the baggage master was declaiming bitterly against all human and dog kind.

THE GIRL AND THE GRAFTER (April 15).—The city editor was really a human being, not one of those cold heartless machines which some writers like to talk about. His staff was enthusiastically loyal to him and every member of it sympathized when it seemed that his star was in danger of an eclipse. The editor had printed a story which met with the disapproval of the city's political boss, who revenged himself by giving news "beats" to the rival sheets. The managing editor realized what the trouble was, and determined to sacrifice his hard working assistant. However, he gave him one week's grace, but made it clear that at the end of the time if he was still on the outs with the boss he must seek another job. The paper had one girl reporter, and contrary to precedent, the city editor admired her. Womanlike she understood the situation, but knew that there would be no romance in her life, not even a proposal, if the city editor was discharged. Therefore, she hated the boss, oh, how she hated him.

Out on an assignment one day the girl happened to pass a cheap lodging house and was surprised when the boss came out, and went down the street. She saw the tenant who had been talking with him, and recognized him as one of the traction company's lobbyists. Being a bright newspaper woman she was convinced that something was wrong, and that perhaps she might have a chance to checkmate her enemy. On the impulse of the moment she applied for accommodations and succeeded in securing the room immediately adjoining that of the lobbyist.

A day or two later the lobbyist and the boss were closing up "a business transaction," which necessitated the passing of real money. The door of the next room opened, the men were blinded by a flashlight and the girl rushed away with a photograph which meant ruin for the grafters.

The city's editor did not lose his job. Neither did he "make up with the boss," as he had been ordered to do. There was no necessity, for the boss went to the penitentiary and was unable to attend the wedding of the city editor and the girl reporter, even had he cared to do so.

RETRIBUTION (April 18).—Although the young man was a prosperous storekeeper in a little country town, he was not contented with his lot in life, for his ambition was to be rich and to have a handsome home in the city. And when an uncle died, his desire was gratified, for he was left a large fortune and a city home.

The young man left the little town, but told his pretty fiancée that he would soon return to wed her and bring her to his handsome home. But when he arrived in the city and was launched in the gay social life, he soon began to feel that the little country belle would not make a fit wife for him, so he wrote to her, breaking the engagement and brutally telling her to seek "a husband in her own station in life." The girl was heartbroken for a while, but soon a manly farmer won her heart and made her forget that she had ever cared for her unworthy suitor.

The rich man became engaged to a beautiful girl, very prominent socially, who professed to care very much for him. He made her many handsome presents and looked forward to the time when she would be his wife. But his dream was rudely dissipated when news was received that his trustee had lost his fortune in speculation, for his fiancee promptly cast him aside. None of his city friends cared for him, now that he was penniless and he steadily sank in the social scale.

Several years later, a tattered, weary tramp, stopped at a little farm house to ask for food. The farmer's wife, a pretty young woman, came to the door, and the tramp, in surprise and shame, recognized the girl whom he had once spurned. She did not recognize the natty storekeeper in the dirty vagrant, but gladly gave him food. As the tramp shuffled slowly down the road, he saw the young wife run joyously from the house to greet her husband. Happily they entered their home, and the tramp sadly continued his journey, realizing that if he had been loyal he would not now be a homeless wanderer.

CUPID IN A DENTAL PARLOR (April 21).—Harold is in love with Ethel Parks, but finds scant favor with her father. Parks always manages to get his daughter away from her admirer, but one day Harold makes bold to call at the house. The reception he receives shows him plainly that he will never win the old man's favor.

Harold goes to see his friend, the dentist. While there, Parks comes in, suffering with an aching tooth, accompanied by Ethel. Harold jams him down into the chair and applies the gas, and soon Parks is in slumberland. Harold persuades the dentist to take Ethel to the minister's house and await him there. On the way the dentist, himself a suitor, convinces Ethel that she should marry him, and the knot is tied. When Harold rushes up he is coldly met by the couple who inform him that they are married, and Harold vents his spleen on the little dentist.

A FISHY AFFAIR (April 24).—Perkins likes to fish, and his wife scolds about his lazy habits. She hides her savings in an old stocking, which she conceals under the mattress of the bed. A tramp enters the open window and steals the hoard. She imagines her husband has taken the money and is very angry. A policeman has seen the tramp and gives chase. Hard pressed, he throws the stocking into the river. While the policeman continues his pursuit, Perkins sits down on the bank to fish. The fish are seen nibbling around the hook by clever photography. Perkins thinks he has a bite and pulls up his line, finding the stocking attached to the hook. He throws it into his basket, and goes on fishing. Finally he gets another bite and hauls up an alligator. Thoroughly frightened, he rushes away and plunges into the midst of a score of alligators, and he has a narrow escape from the snapping jaws.

The cop and the tramp have an exciting chase and fight, and the strong arm of the law drags the hapless wretch back to the Perkins home. Mrs. Perkins sees the stocking in the fish basket and brings it out. The tramp convinces them of his innocence, and Perkins is indignant to think his wife should suspect him of taking her money, but she finally cajoles him into forgiveness.

THE BANGVILLE POLICE (April 24).—Della expresses her wish for a calf to play with and her father to surprise her buys one and has it sent home. Della sees the men in the barn and thinking they are thieves, telephones for the police. They have many amusing adventures in reaching the scene in an old automobile, which finally blows up. Della has locked the doors and piled the furniture against them, and all efforts of the rescuing party meet with added screams on her part. The door is finally broken down and she is dragged from a closet where she has taken refuge, and the situation is cleared.

FUNNICUS IS TIRED OF LIFE (April 24).—Funnicus was too proud to bear the humiliations attached to an empty pocketbook, and therefore decided to put an end to his troubles, by killing himself. He then reviewed in his mind, one after the other, the different ways by which he might kill himself. He thought that stabbing himself would not succeed, as the only knife in reach was a badly sharpened, and vulgar kitchen knife, which would only tear his poor skin. What about drowning? It was nice Spring weather. As we see our unhappy Funnicus melancholy, and reviewing the different ways by which he might end this awful life, a group of students, also without a cent in their pockets, and on the lookout for pleasure and laughter, and realizing that the bigger the crowd the merier the time, take with them one of the "dummies" stationed at the door of a tailor.

Funnicus, not heeding all this excitement, still paced up and down, nursing his troubles, and contemplating suicide. After the students had dragged their "cardboard" comrade from door to door, they became tired of it, and resolved to get rid of it by throwing the dummy in the river. Funnicus decided at the same time to leap overboard, dashed to the river. Much to the alarm of this crowd of foolish boys, he jumped in also. The boys screamed "Help! Help!" and ran in the direction of the drowning.

A crowd quickly gathered to help the drowning man, but as fate would have it, the current pulled him to the other side of the river. But the sui-

The Only Lenses Giving The Greatest Possible Illumination
The Only Lenses Exact in Focal Length To Within 1-100 of an Inch

There were no high grade Lenses on the market until GUNDLACH LENSES were made and none now that equal them in optical quality and illuminating power.

The GUNDLACH NO. 2 PROJECTION LENSES made the long throw possible and already hundreds of theater owners have taken advantage of this opportunity to increase their theaters in length and seating capacity adding to their profits at the same time.

The superior quality of GUNDLACH PROJECTION LENSES is recognized by the leading makers of machines and they will be supplied to order in place of the ordinary lens equipment at very little increase in price.

No matter how well satisfied you are with your picture we invite you to order a GUNDLACH PROJECTION LENS for trial to see the difference. Nearly all our lenses are sold to exhibitors who have ordinary lenses, but are looking for something better. In many cases a customer orders one lens for trial and then re-equips all his machines, sometimes the machines of several theaters.

cide was delayed by the fact, that when poor Funnicus was contemplating drowning himself, he saw the leap into the river of the "dummy" and thinking it was a man, decided to do one redeeming act of charity before dying, and save this unfortunate. That is why he also leaped into the river, pursuing this drowning object, and succeeded in bringing it to the other side of the river. But, when he proceeded to give it in charge of the villagers, he was laughed at and then arrested.

ELECTRICAL PHENOMENA (April 24). — The electric machine, called a "statia machine," which will produce the electricity necessary for our experiments, is composed of two discs of glass turning in opposite directions, and fitted with small copper plates. Metallic brushes touch the copper plates and electrify them; conductors or "combs" fitted with points collect the electricity developed by the passage of the brushes on the copper plates and vivid sparks appear between the balls of the machine.

In the experiment of the "Tourniquet," needles with points, which are curved, turn in opposite directions to the points; this is a phenomenon due to the repulsion caused by the electricity passing through these points.

An experiment made by Benjamin Franklin is also depicted in this film: A kite, fitted with a metal point, ascends to gather atmospheric electricity from the clouds. If, at the base of the metal cord attached to the kite, we hang a key, the approach of another key causes large sparks to appear. In America, after Franklin's discovery, exaggeration was so great, that umbrellas were fitted with lightning conductors connected with the ground by a metal chain.

Another experiment from Faraday is also depicted here: A little bird is protected from the electric discharge, it's cage being entirely of metal, by attaching it to the ground with a connecting wire as a conductor. The lightning conductor which leads the electric spark into the earth was discovered by Benjamin Franklin in 1753.

RELIANCE.

FOR LOVE OF COLUMBINE (April 12).—Back of the scenes at a theater, a boy, Pierrot, and a girl, Columbine, played at love. With the girl it was just fun, but with the boy it was real, serious, earnest love. She loved to tease him by flirting with the other boys. Soon she married a wealthy admirer and went to live in a big mansion. She thought she could tease her husband, like she teased Pierrot, by flirting with other men. He left her. In her grief, Columbkine went to Pierrot at the theater. He still loved her and often visited her at her boarding house. Her grief is such that Pierrot formed a plan for a reconciliation. He put on evening clothes and went to the husband's club and got in conversation with him. Pretending drunkenness, he boasted how a pretty Columbine had left her husband and come to him. This aroused the husband's jealousy and Pierrot took him to Columbine. Their quarrel was patched up and Pierrot returned to the theater with a heavy heart to make others laugh.

HELD FOR RANSOM (2 parts—April 16).—Young Gordon Grant, swindled out of his fortune by Cyrus Brooks, a wealthy financier, vows to get even. Gordon goes home to Virginia, takes his few belongings to a high mountain hut, and becomes a hermit. One day an auto is stalled on the mountain. In it are Brooks and his daughter, while Brooks and the chauffeur go for assistance Gordon carries the girl to his hut. There he tells her of her father's deeds, and notifies Brooks that his daughter is held for ransom. The girl rather enjoys the situation. One day on the mountain she and Gordon see a legendary apparition formed by mist. Gordon takes this as an omen that he has done wrong and sets the girl free. She goes and pleads with her father to make restitution and threatens to return to Gordon if he does not. The old man relents and gives her the amount, which she takes to Gordon. She and Bordon have learned to love each other and they return to the world together.

KAY-BEE.

WILL O' THE WISP (2 parts, April 25).—Jim Dorne's circus, enroute to California, stops at the settlement town. Bud Watkins is living happily with his young wife and little baby. Mrs. Dorne meets the owner of the show, who persuades her to enter a riding contest, and she wins the first prize, a complete riding habit. Dorne and Watkins become good friends, and Watkins invites the circus owner to stop at his house. Dorne takes advantage of the opportunities afforded him while the husband is out prospecting, to fill Mrs. Watkins' head full of wild notions of fame and fortune, and she goes away with the circus, leaving a note to Bud reading: "I cannot stand this lonesome life any longer. I have joined the circus merely as a performer, Bud, for I love you. Take care of baby and don't try to follow. Will write soon."

Bud is broken-hearted, and beomes greatly angered at the circus man, vowing, in his first moments of wild grief to kill Dorne, but he calms down and begins to think of getting his wife back again.

Mrs. Watkins finds that circus life is not the rosy path pictured to her, and writes to her husband, but Dorne intercepts the letters and tears them up. She has become friendly with the strong man and his wife, the couple having a tiny baby which reminds Nell Watkins of her own child at home. One day, perplexed because she does not hear from Bud, Nell discovers that Dorne has been stopping her letters, and in a furious scene she upbraids him. Her biting words sting the circus man to terrible fury, and he attacks her, but the strong man comes to her aid and thrashes Dorne. The three performers quit the show and try to make their way back, but become lost in the desert, and the baby dies.

The trio, after enduring much hardship finally reach Nell's home, and a tender reconciliation takes place between Bud and his wife.

The circus goes on its way, and is attacked by a band of hostile Indians. A terrible battle takes place, in which the circus people madly fight for their lives. A troop of cavalry in search of the hostiles hear the firing and gallop to the scene, where, after a sharp battle, the Indians are driven off.

At the beginning of the battle Dorne deserted his followers and took refuge in a cave, in the back of which he found a hole and endeavored to escape. The rifle shots have set fire to the dry grass, however, and the wind whips the flames into rushing mountains of fire, which are shown pursuing the terror-stricken man until they overtake him and engulf him in their lurid embrace.

BRONCHO

RETROGRESSION (2 parts — April 23).—Jim Hardy, serving time for safe cracking, receives notice that his term has expired, and tells his cellmate, Rusty, that he is going to start life anew and keep straight. Rusty laughs at him and tells him he will not get a chance to reform, as the police will hound him to death. Hardy receives a new suit of clothes and five dollars, and is met at the prison door by his daughter, Helen. He gets work in a grocery store, but a detective recognizes him and tells the proprietor that he is harboring an ex-convict, and Hardy is discharged. Helen has been working and saving her money, and she suggests to her father that they go west and start life anew in the west. Hardy is given a chance to make good, being employed as a watchman in the little western bank.

Lieut. Baker, of the U. S. Cavalry, meets Helen, and the two young people fall in love. Hardy writes to Busty as follows:

"Dear Pal Rusty: Got a good job as a night watchman in a bank. Don't laugh. It's on the square. Can you imagine me watching a safe with twenty thousand in it and dead easy to crack. But I'm temptation proof as long as I can let the Amber Devil, whiskey, alone. Look for a letter from you shortly. Your old pal, Jim Hardy."

A week later Rusty takes advantage of visiting day to secure access to the lockers, and escapes dressed in a guard's uniform. He makes his way to Hardy's town, and is taken in by the latter and fed and clothed.

Detective Burton, on the trail of the escaped convict, follows his man. Rusty sees him in a saloon and rushes back in fear to Hardy. He plies Hardy with whiskey, and tells him that the detective will make him lose his job, and that he had better crack the safe and get away with the money. Helen tries to interfere, but Rusty roughly tells her to keep still or he will tell her sweetheart her father is an ex-convict.

That night they attempt to rob the bank. Rusty keeps watch while Hardy enters and blows open the vault doors. The detective is on the job, however, and Hardy finds himself looking into the barrel of a pistol held by Burton at the window. Rusty sneaks up behind the detective and deals him a crushing blow, rendering him unconscious. Helen, who has mustered up courage at the last moment to attempt to stop the robbery and save her father from crime, rushes up and is attacked by Rusty. Hardy runs to the defense of his daughter and in the scuffle is shot and killed. Rusty making his escape. The banker believes that his watchman has been killed by the burglar. Helen confesses everything to Lieut. Baker, who goes to the detective, when he has regained consciousness and persuades him to remain silent regarding Hardy's past. He tells Helen that she is not to blame for her father's sins, and marries her.

Rusty flees into lands occupied by hostile Indians, and is attacked, meeting a tragic death.

MISCELLANEOUS.

GREAT NORTHERN.

THE TWO CONVICTS (April 19).—Beck and Lind are two young tourists who happen to be near the country place of Mr. Brenta, when Black Bill and his pal escape from a prison some little distance away. As the tourists are sauntering along the road, Brenta and his daughters, Emma and Mabel pass them in their carriage. It appeared like a double case of love at first sight. In the meantime, Black Bill and his pal have changed their prison garb in the house of a friend and sally forth. They encounter the young tourists and then notify the magistrate through a note that the convicts who escaped are disguised as tourists. Beck and Lind present themselves at the Brenta home, and on account of their gentlemanly demeanor, are permitted to be guests overnight. After the family and guests have retired Black Bill pays a midnight visit to the house and enters the room occupied by the tourists. He steals Lind's note book and his money when he is discovered in the act of escaping. Lind grabs him, but in a spirit of charity and forgiveness, decides not to turn him over to the police. Instead, he allows him to keep the money and pocketbook and advises him to mend his ways. On the following morning Judge Smith arrives at the Brenta home and informs the family that two convicts have been harbored overnight. There is suppressed excitement while the police are being summoned, and when Beck and Lind appear they are openly accused. Just as they are about to be arrested, Black Bill enters and returns the money and pocketbook to Lind. Then all is made clear and Black Bill makes a clean breast of his escape and the deception he had practiced. Before the close of the story it is apparent that Lind and Emma love each other and the same sentiment is manifest between Beck and Mabel.

The husband writes a message to his wife stating that he knows her love for his brother and that he has committed suicide. This note, together with his hat, overcoat and pocketbook, he leaves upon the rocks, where it is found by some fishermen, who take it to the wife.

The shock of her husband's supposed death unseats his wife's reason. The demented woman seeing visions of her husband seated in his accustomed chair. As she tries to embrace him her arms pass through his phantom, she sinks back desperate. The husband reads of his wife's sad condition and hurries home. The family physician determines to try a desperate remedy. The husband is placed in the chair the vision has so long occupied. Once more the woman tries to embrace the vision and finds it flesh and blood. With a joyous cry of "He lives, he lives" she sinks limp into the arms of her husband.

STEAM.—This picture shows the development of steam power from the period when James Watt discovered its ability to lift the lid of a tea kettle—and deduced therefrom the hoisting engine for use in the English mine pits—to its culmination in the modern high-speed locomotive.

The chief incidents in the lives of the inventor of the first steam engine, and George Stephenson, who built the first locomotive, are woven into the story—which includes the homely romances and happy marriages of both these homespun geniuses. Furthermore, the film shows a faithful model of the original Watt engine in operation, and also a working reproduction of Stephenson's queer looking locomotive. The first trip of this historic engine is shown in the story—even to the humorous detail of the man on horseback riding ahead of the train and waving a red flag to warn the unsuspecting public off the track.

MODELING EXTRAORDINARY.—An absolutely novel trick subject, full of amusing and unexpected developments.

FEATHERTOP.—A picture adapted from one of Hawthorne's stories. The tale is of early Colonial New England, with appropriate costumes and settings. A witch creates a scarecrow. Godkin, one of the villagers, has a pretty daughter, and for her he is very ambitious. The witch has a grudge against Godkin. She transforms the scarecrow, Feathertop, into a handsome man. The daughter falls in love with him. It is love at first sight. Poor Feathertop passes in front of the mirror, where, to his horror, and that of the girl, he sees his true reflection—not the exquisite dandy, but the scarecrow, clothed in rags. He rushes home to his creator and denounces her, saying: "You could give me life, but not a soul." We see him gradually fade into a scarecrow, which sways and topples to the floor, a heap of wood and straw.

As he completes the promoting of his biggest enterprise, an independent sugar refinery, he becomes acquainted with Jessie Cleveland, the daughter of his heaviest investor. The girl, her illusions shattered, goes away, presumably for her health, saying nothing to her father as to her interview with Rose. At a meeting of the Board of Directors—a strong scene—Rose is denounced by Jessie's father—who has been investigating matters privately—for inveigling him and his friends to invest in an enterprise that Rose knew to be questionable. Rose is on the point of admitting his duplicity when a wire arrives from the sugar trust, which is in need of equipment, making a splendid offer for the independent plant. (This situation is taken from life. Note the conditions of the sale of the Adolph Segal Sugar Refinery plant to the trust in Philadelphia). Rose's status instantly changes from that of a scheming fakir to that of a financial genius. The directors vote to accept the offer, apologize to Rose and congratulate him. Jessie and Rose are reconciled and the latter, warned by his narrow escape and his moral sense awakened by love, abandons his scheming and goes into legitimate business with his fiancée's father.

After the courier has departed, the servant spy sends a telegram. "Courier leaves tonight. Will be interesting to know what bag contains."

Two accomplices of the spy board the train with the courier and enter the same compartment. The nurse takes this train also and enters the next compartment. As the train is passing through a tunnel she hears a noise. Looking through a window, she sees the courier being overpowered by the secret emissaries. At the first station the nurse informs an officer of the crime. Men rush back to where the courier had been thrown from the train. They find him, seriously wounded. The courier tells the nurse that his despatches were stolen. One contained the information that a convoy of war supplies was scheduled to cross the frontier on that day for headquarters. It is understood then that the enemies' purpose is to wreck the train. The nurse, with special officers, rush in an automobile to the place where they know the secret emissaries would try to derail the train. MEXICAN CONSPIRACY OUT-GENERALED.—Mexico is in the midst of a revolution. General Galvez, commanding the loyal Federal troops, seeks to obtain a loan from Harriman & Tipps, Wall Street bankers. Herminia, a maid in the general's household, overhears the conference and informs Tonio, colonel of the Rebels, who sends his spy, Karr, to New York to get the loan for the Rebel army. Unsuccessful, Karr robs the New York firm of the money and makes his escape to Mexico.

Martha Langley, of the Tinkerton Detective Agency, is sent to Mexico immediately. Tipps also goes to Mexico to discuss the loan with General Galvez. Tipps leaves the general's home and Karr enters secretly through a window to steal the Federal plans of attack. In the ensuing struggle he stabs General Galvez and makes his get-away unobserved.

Tipps is arrested at the railway station and accused of the murder as the last one to leave the presence of the general. Martha picks up a hatband in the room where the struggle took place and sets out to find the real murderer. She falls into a trap laid for her by Karr's desperadoes, and recovers consciousness with her luxuriant hair fastened in the drawer of a washstand. With a pair of manicure scissors, she cuts herself loose, digs a hole through the stone wall of her prison and escapes by swimming the river.

Going to the home of the murdered general, Martha disguises herself as the maid and secures a note sent by Karr, the murderer. She brings about Karr's capture and gets the U. S. Consul to intercede just in time to save Tipps from being lynched. After her heroic work in his behalf, Tipps quite naturally falls in love with Martha and persuades her to marry him. A year later they are shown in their Northern home with a little baby to bring them joy.

RESTITUTION.—Having lost his fortune, Emile Marval went to America to regain it and left his son, Robert, then a young boy, in the care of his old friend, Duschesne, a notary. Several months after Marval returned with an immense fortune, and the sight of the money animated Duschesne's insatiable greed for gold. By a stratagem the avaricious Duschesne extinguished the life of the millionaire, acquired the fortune and adopted the boy. Twenty years later Robert, grown to manhood, is enamoured with Banker Lazare's daughter. Sometime later Mr. Darbois, a friend of Marvel, called upon the son. In the interview Robert learned that his father was a very wealthy man, and the fact that he died poor aroused the suspicions of Darbois; he decided to investigate. In the guise of an old clerk, Darbois secured a position as private secretary to the notary, and it was in this capacity that he learned of the hiding place of Duschesne's ill-gotten gains. He told the son, who, noting the strong resemblance between his father and Darbois, disguised him so that he looked like the murdered man. That night, when the old notary went to the hiding place to count his gold, Darbois appeared. He thought it was the ghost of Marvel and in terror, fled from the place. Robert and Darbois went to the home of the banker, Lazare, and told him of their discovery. All went to the notary's home, but all they found when they reached the place was a mass of wreckage, Duschesne's conscience having troubled him so much that he dynamited the house. They extricated the dead body of the notary, secured the fortune, and a short while after Robert and the banker's daughter were happily married.

AN ACCURSED INHERITANCE.—Against the protests of his many friends, Gallois, a Norman horse dealer, at the baptism of his second son, Lucien, gave his first son, Charles, still a very young boy, his first glass of wine. This started a long train of trouble which came to this family. Fifteen years later, Lucien was graduated with honors from a medical college, while his brother was a ne'er-do-well caused by drink. At the wedding festival of Lucien and Jeanne, Charles' disgraceful actions brought on the death of his father. For a long time after Lucien and his wife had heard nothing of Charles, until one day they received a letter from the derelict saying that as he has conquered drink he would like to be taken into their home. He was. But at the christening of the daughter of Jeanne, Charles lost control of himself and again his disgraceful actions caused the sacrifice of life of the newly made mother. Twenty years later, Cecille, the daughter, has become engaged to Roger Devieu. A few days before her wedding day, Cecille was attacked, when driving, by a tramp. On account of her nervous state she was unable to give a description of the tramp to the police. However, the derelict was later apprehended and when he was brought face to face with Cecille, Lucien recognized his brother. The terrible shock was too much for Cecille and she, too, passed away on her wedding day.

Have Your Theatre Smell Like a Garden of Flowers

Problem of Destroying Foul Odors and Purifying Air of Picture Houses Solved by New Scientific Chemical Discovery.

Dr. H. V. Flamhaft, a well known Chemist of Syracuse, N. Y., has solved a problem that has long puzzled many a Moving Picture House Manager. He has succeeded, after many experiments, in producing a highly concentrated and very powerful disinfectant, that not only purifies the air, almost instantly destroying Foul Odors and making Wholesome the close, tainted atmosphere of the theatre, but that leaves a delicious, delicate and lasting fragrance equal to that of the highest grade floral perfumes. Moving picture managers who have tested this new floral disinfectant, unite in declaring it the very best and most economical antiseptic they have ever used. A gallon of this product, which is called is equal in strength to 10 gallons of the ordinary weak disinfectant solution, and in a large house will give splendid results for weeks. Its cost per gallon is $2.00, and it will be sent in such quantity upon receipt of price on an absolute guarantee of satisfaction or money back. It is suggested that Managers who have experienced difficulty in purifying the air of their houses take advantage of this opportunity. Address

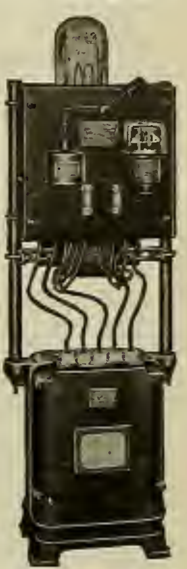
The Use of a Rectifier Makes Pictures More Brilliant

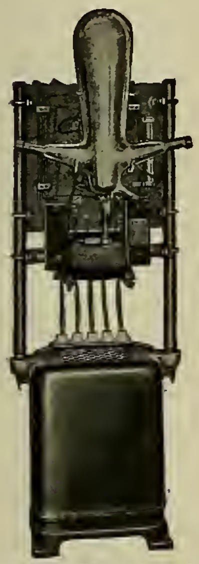
It is well recognized that for the projection of pictures, the direct current arc lamp is far superior to the lamp using alternating current. The light is more steady and intense, and a far greater proportion of the light is directed toward the lens.



Motion Picture Rectifier Set
Front View

The ordinary lighting circuit furnishes alternating current only, but by using a G-E Mercury Arc Rectifier, this alternating current is changed into direct current.

The use of the rectifier makes possible much more brilliant pictures than can be obtained when alternating current is used in the lamp.



Motion Picture Rectifier Set
Rear View

The operation of the rectifier is easy and its use decreases the cost of the electricity consumed at the same time that it improves the quality of the pictures.

Write our nearest office for Booklet B-3107 giving the results of comparative tests on projection lamps using alternating and direct current, and explaining the operation of the rectifier.

MUSIC AND THE PICTURE

The intelligent and successful motion picture exhibitor is fully aware of the great value of appropriate music with the pictures.

Managers all over the country are beginning to realize that a refined musical entertainment is a big drawing card for the moving picture theatre.

The musical program is replacing the mediocre vaudeville, and some exhibitors have invested a large amount of money in pipe organs and other expensive instruments.

Before deciding upon such an investment, we would advise managers of moving picture theatres to investigate the many musical aids we can offer.

Our musical novelty instruments are known all over the world. Our new Catalogue "F," just out, describes most of which will prove immensely successful and most attractive in any moving picture theatre.

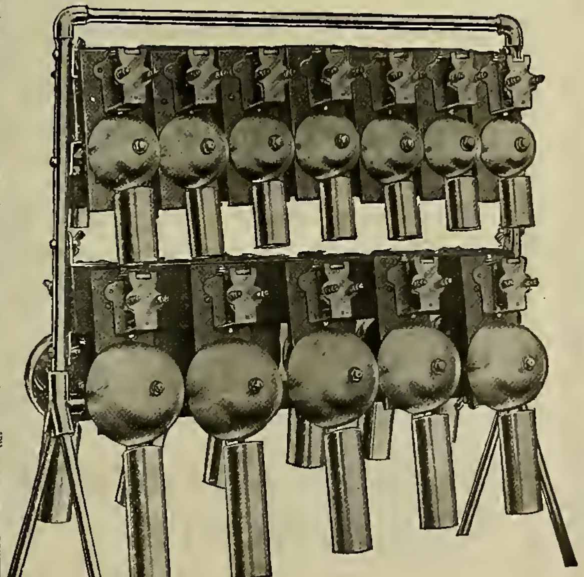
These instruments are wide in range and moderate in cost. They are easy to manipulate, and any piano player can play them with little or no practice. Most of our instruments are provided with an ivory keyboard, just like a piano, and many of these instruments can be placed around different parts of the house, and in this way a very novel and pleasing effect can be obtained.

We beg to attract your attention particularly to our new

MUSICAL ELECTRICAL BELLS



We have spent over a year perfecting and improving these bells.

The Deagan Bells are made of purest bell metal, sweet and mellow in tone. They can be played either soft or loud, single stroke or vibrating, at the will of the operator, by merely pressing buttons conveniently located on the keyboard.

The set of Bells here shown range twenty-five notes, two octaves chromatic from C to C, are mounted on floor rack ready to play, and are connected to the keyboard from which they are operated, by a twenty-five foot flexible cable.

We can also supply Bells of the same type as above unmounted, to be mounted about in various parts of the theatre, if you prefer them that way.

Many of the most prominent theatres in the country have installed the Hallberg, and I have received hundreds of inquiries regarding this much talked of device during the past few weeks. Sunday, April 20. THE CHILDREN'S CONSPIRACY

It was all in the interests of their pretty little teacher whom a heartless school board deposed—to make a job for a crusty old schoolmam who was "related," and the youthful schemers overcame this great opposition by simply—scheming.

Tuesday, April 22. AN AMERICAN IN THE MAKING

From the "greenhorn," fresh from the "old country," you stay with him while he seeks and lands an American job, an American wife and American happiness; also is shown the ingenious American safety devices that protected him while he was in the making.

Friday, April 25. FOR ANOTHER'S SIN (In two reels, with Priscilla's Pets.)

The man who has erred and paid the prison penalty finds with horror that a friend is treading the selfsame downward path; the friend has a family and a future, the ex-convict has neither, and he persuades the friend to allow him to take the blame and the punishment.

BECAUSE

BANKER AND BAKER, MADAM AND MENIAL, SUSIE FROM SIEGEL'S—EACH FEELS A SEPARATE THRILL. A charming love tale of a miserly uncle who leaves a supposedly barren tract of beach to his pretty niece—her immigration with her sweetheart to that lonesome spot—the discovery of oil—all staged at Summerland, California, THE ONLY REGION IN THE WORLD WHERE OIL IS TAKEN FROM THE OCEAN'S BED.

THE BUSINESS MAN feels a keen interest in the business of mining oil—particularly where great shafts are sunk to the ocean bottom. Through this entertaining educational runs the thread of delightful adventure—love and business gracefully interwoven with the fabric of commercialism. A genuinely masterful illustration of how the intelligent producer can both entertain and instruct.

A JACK KERRIGAN picture, featuring that most popular of picture folk at his best, backed by splendid photography and admittedly the most remarkably interesting backgrounds we have ever seen. To miss this is to deny your audience an intellectual relish.

"AN EXCITING HONEYMOON"

PATHEPLAY IN TWO REELS. RELEASED SATURDAY, APRIL 26th, 1913.

THE funniest, happiest, wholesomest comedy in years! Two reels of screaming hilarity. Lord Rowley, the unfortunate and near-sighted groom, loses his eyeglasses just after the ceremony and starts on his bridal tour with the colored cook instead of the sweet little girl he has just married. An exciting auto chase; a race down the bay on a tug after the departing steamer; the flight of Lord Rowley down the ventilator into the coal bunkers—these are but few of the situations that make this greatest laugh-getting film ever released. Featuring Gwendolyne Pates and Charles Arling.

"HEARTS OF THE FIRST EMPIRE"

VITAGRAPH IN TWO REELS. RELEASED MONDAY, APRIL 28th, 1913.

A STORY of the days of Emperor Napoleon. A young country girl is found by Marie Louise, in the poorest section of Paris. To save her from further cruelty, the Empress takes her to the palace and trains her as a Maid of Honor. After furnishing the court attendants with no end of amusement by her awkward manners, she makes great improvements, and eventually becomes a great favorite. In time, she wins a noble husband, but first she "kills a rogue and outwits an Emperor." A superb production with William Humphrey as Napoleon, Edith Storey as Marie Louise and Leah Baird as Beatrice, the country girl.

"THROUGH MANY TRIALS"

LUBIN IN TWO REELS. RELEASED WEDNESDAY, APRIL 30th, 1913.

A BEAUTIFUL pastoral drama, in which we follow the wooing of the farmer's daughter by the rich young artist, their elopement and subsequent marriage. Then the proof of the old proverb "Marry in haste, repent at leisure." The artist-husband returns to his life in Bohemia, and neglects his wife. A child is born and the father realizes his neglect. Back at his painting, he strives hard for success and wins. Later, the little family goes to see "the old folks" and there is a general reconciliation, with everybody happy. A simple story of plain people, with the necessary element of human interest.

"THE BROKEN VOW"

CINES-KLEINE IN TWO REELS. RELEASED FRIDAY, MAY 2nd, 1913.

JULIET, the simple shepherdess, and Tony, the herder on the ranch of a wealthy Cattle King, are enamored with each other. Often they meet at the trysting place, under a giant tree on the edge of a cliff. Juliet is accidentally shot and is removed to the home of the Cattle King, where she recovers. Tempted by promises of presents and other wealth, she finally marries him. Two years pass, and Tony observes the ranchman riding through the woods. A fight ensues and results in a victory for Tony who, after tieing the ranchman to the tree at the trysting place, sends for Juliet, and, before the eyes of the husband, throws her and himself over the cliff into eternity.

Here is a typical example of the successful exhibitors who "swear by" General Film Service. Superior single-reel pictures and better multiple-reel features, an organization that is the biggest and the most efficient of its kind in the world, distributing offices so located that they cover the entire country, and each in charge of a manager whose chief duty it is to see that exhibitors are served promptly, properly and impartially—these are a few of the things that have made permanent friends for General Film Service.

After all, there isn't a good reason in the world why you shouldn't talk with us about General Film Service, even though you decide later not to use it. Shall we put you in touch with one of our offices?

"The Ideal Moving Picture" is in General Film Service

UNDER the heading "Moving Pictures Improving," in the editorial columns of its April 5th issue, the Wenatchee, Wash., World has this to say:

> "Last night we saw at one of the local theatres what appealed to us as the ideal moving picture. It was a two-reel drama entitled 'The Redemption.' No sermon ever preached a greater lesson morally; no climaxes were ever built up more effectively; nothing of more gripping heart interest is imaginable. The audience was worked up to fever heat of interest. The acting was masterful and the technique superb. The photography was faultless. It was a triumph."

"The Redemption" is a Kalem production and was released in General Film Service on February 21st. Every program brings others just as good.

Facts and Comments

WHEN the opening of a motion picture theater is made the occasion of a holiday and the mayor and the clergy of the town assemble and take part in the opening ceremonies, the friends of the motion picture have just cause for rejoicing. Such an event took place in a typical American community, when a fine, new motion picture theater was opened in Hasbrouck Heights, N. J. The place is a large colony of homes, one of the units which make up our strength and character as a nation. Every person in the town takes a civic pride in the motion picture theater, which becomes the centre of social life in the community. The ministers, instead of denouncing the motion picture, come out with unqualified indorsements, and the principal and the teachers are in constant touch with the exhibitor to be sure of receiving the full benefit of all good educational pictures. The relations between the members of the community and the exhibitor are the pleasantest and happiest possible.

How has all this been brought about? The character and the good judgment of the exhibitor are responsible. The exhibitor went into the town about a year ago, unknown and confronted by prejudice. He hired a small hall and gave the people a clean, satisfactory entertainment. Prejudice began to die, the best people in the community offered their encouragement and assistance in widening the sphere of usefulness. They realized what such a clean and healthy amusement meant to their children and to the morals of the town at large. They looked upon their help to the exhibitor as a civic duty, and thus from a small seed there grew a good harvest. It all goes to show once more what a powerful hold the motion picture has on the affections of the people.

* * *

IT may be well for exhibitors who are doing so much for the relief of flood sufferers to remember that among the victims of the recent disasters were not a few of their own calling. These, it seems to us, are entitled to a first call on the funds collected through the sole efforts of exhibitors. Some way no doubt will be found by the organized exhibitors in each State to make sure of this. There may not have been any very heavy individual losses, but there must have been a goodly number of sufferers among moving picture men, and every one of them should be taken care of by his fellows in the profession.

* * *

MOVING pictures were never used for a nobler purpose than to show to a large number of poor young mothers on the East Side the dangers of impure milk. Many hundreds of these struggling and devoted women crowded into the Mariners Temple on Oliver Street in this city, representing many nationalities. Many of these women were recent immigrants, and hardly any of them understood much English. A lecture in English, though couched in the simplest words, would have been lost upon them. By means of proper motion pictures, however, the right appeal was easily made. The motion pictures shown portrayed family tragedies resulting from the use of impure milk. The difference between sanitary and unsanitary dairies was likewise eloquently illustrated in motion pictures.

WHY should the motion picture man be the goat? This interesting and pertinent question is raised by the members of the Cleveland Exhibitors' League in a letter to the president of the National organization, published elsewhere in this issue of The Moving Picture World. Undoubtedly there is just cause for the complaint of the Cleveland exhibitors. What with being harassed by petty city officials, pestered by the unreasoning complaints of self-constituted reformers and meddlers and the strictures of press and clergy, the lot of the picture exhibitor is not an easy one. If there is an occupation that is subject to the criticism that seems to be poured out gratuitously upon the head of the picture man, we must confess that we do not know its name. It is time that his status in the community was definitely defined by some court of competent jurisdiction, so that he may engage in his peculiar pursuit of happiness without molestation. We hope that the appeal of the Cleveland exhibitors to the head of their craft may be productive of results.

* * *

FROM President Samuel Trigger of the New York Exhibitors' Association we learn that the prospect of success of the first American Motion Picture Exposition is most gratifying. Applications for space in New York's Grand Central Palace, where the big picture show will be held, are coming in rapidly, and the exhibits to be made will be of a highly interesting character. Many novel features will hold the attention of the visiting public, and the members of the trade will find much to instruct them regarding the things in which they are most deeply interested.

The Fascinating Criminal

By Louis Reeves Harrison

WITHOUT going deeply into the question why fruit acquires a more delicate flavor when surreptitiously snipped from a neighbor's orchard, or why married women with unpunished husbands heap floral tributes upon the law's occasional victim, or why we buy a yellow-covered book with an outside design in black of a man with piercing eyes leveling a pistol at another instead of a work on dynamic sociology, the despairing fact confronts us that a morbid taste for adventures in crime does exist. Even sated motion-picture audiences have been known to manifest lively interest in the outcast, a sneaking fellow-feeling, especially when he is being chased by a sheriff's posse firing blank cartridges as fast as they can shoot.

This can only be explained by a survival within us of what was going on in the Dark Ages, when almost anything the average man did to displease the privileged one constituted a crime. When you really come to know something about the professional criminal, he turns out to be a pathetic disappointment. Even the average little hopeful who aspires to be a pirate and scuttle ships on the Spanish Main, if he could but know the unvarnished truth about the careers of those who live vicious and lawless lives, would enter a boy choir and limit his aspirations to that of being a minister of the gospel on a scenario writer's income.

Real criminals have been examined by thousands in the interest of social improvement, and most of the incorrigible delinquents are found to be morally insane and physically decrepit. They are nearly always distorted growths from poor stocks. Scientists have not yet told us how far removed they are from the lawyers who defend them as a means of livelihood, not having examined the lawyers in the interest of society to determine whether they are wholly incapable of assimilating the fruits of moral culture, but it is almost time that the playwright and the teller of screen stories should quit trying to boost an impossible creature upon unsuspecting audiences.

Among the first efforts of a newly-wed director and scenario writer is the tale of the Gentlemanly Burglar and the Lady with the String of Pearls. This sort of realism is as far removed from the true state of things as the wildest idealism of perverted genius. The only burglar of these times to affect a dress suit was Gentleman George, recently apprehended, and a truthful writer, who saw him at police headquarters, while he was being mugged and measured for identification, thus describes him. "He was anaemic, unclean and sunken-cheeked. His teeth were bad, and his vapid blue eyes were foolish-looking." This very man was described in glowing terms by space writers, and his misdeeds may have inspired epics for the screen.

I do not mean that we should have no stage villains. Far be it. How would drama, especially that of the "melo" variety, present a struggle between virtuous and wicked characters without some one to do the dirty work? Do not imagine either that I mean to exclude the unfortunate wretch in striped clothing who is making a desperate struggle to regain his liberty, who kindles our warmest sympathies for various reasons, among them realization that only force of circumstances may have intervened to keep our own clothes from matching his in pattern and design, for he may be shown as sinned against—there are crimes against the criminal once he is a helpless creature within prison walls.

I do not know of any class of men out of jail who monopolize all that is good and true, and neither do you. Most of them are partially good and error-stained in spots, and as we broaden mentally we incline to medical treatment for the moral pervert, with no greater cruelty of punishment than is now given to the insane, to the confinement of habitual criminals arranged with reference to the treatment of their disordered minds, but to glorify such a creature in the eyes of immature members of a motion-picture audience is little short of a crime itself.

At this point rises a delicate question for the intelligent censor, and, for that matter, for the intelligent producer. Crimes of impulse may be exhibited on the screen, especially those of ignorance or error, to show that the relation society and the world at large sustains to the criminal, or false ideas respecting those relations, may be responsible for his acts, that if we direct moral reformation to our faulty institutions—as set forth in "Les Miserables"—we shall have few if any individuals to imprison. It may be necessary to present some revolting details at times to enforce a noble and beneficent purpose.

Take for instance the sinister illumination being thrown upon the grafting relations established between New York police and the underworld. This hideous police organization was created for the protection of society and by society only to prove a filthy and revolting gang, worse than the criminals themselves, protecting the enemies of society, providing them with information, encouraging and aiding them, under pretense of enforcing our crazy-quilt code of laws. There is a farcical side to this extraordinary condition, but the tragic one is of greater importance, and it might be necessary to lay bare some hideous truths for the betterment, if not the safety, of the community.

Then, too, without making heroes of criminals, without conferring insolent grandeur on guilt or making vice seductive, the darker side of human nature, the shadows of the soul, may be used for the purpose of strong contrast—a true presentation of a criminal act may be permitted if the end justifies the means. The whole question lies in conformity to veritable rules of art. There can be no harm in exciting an audience by laying bare some of the worst phases of humanity if the ultimate purpose is elevating, but it is just as well to eliminate the billboard thriller altogether if the impression it makes is degrading in the end.

The fascinating criminal is almost a thing of the past so far as the leading producers are concerned, and intelligent censorship bids fair to eliminate him altogether on the screen, but his pernicious influence has been transferred in the enormous number of theaters now varying their program with vaudeville, consisting too often of acts so frankly gross or so stupidly vulgar that they are more brutalizing than the worst moving pictures ever shown. Censorship exercises no control over them, nor does it seem to be possible to reach them in any way unless exhibitors unite in cleaning house of what is offensive on the boards quite as well as on the screen and present a clean bill straight through.

CREDIT MISPLACED.

In a recent issue of the Moving Picture World, credit for the production of the Edison picture, "From Orton Junction to Fallonville," was given to Charles M. Seay. A letter has been received from Mr. Seay, in which he says that the credit for the production belongs to Charles J. Brabin instead.

A Successful Organizer.

Resume of the Activities of H. E. Aitken, Recently Elected President and General Manager of the Mutual Film Corporation.

H. E. AITKEN has been elected president and general manager of the Mutual Film Corporation. To one unfamiliar with the circumstances leading up to this action this announcement would not excite much comment, as Mr. Aitken's activities are well known in film circles, and he is eminently fitted for the responsible position which he now occupies. Underlying it, however, is a story of incessant labor which overcame obstacles of great magnitude and tore down barriers of precedent and prejudice.

The marvelous progress of the Mutual Film Corporation is not due to the smiles of the Goddess of Fortune, but is the result of carefully laid plans of Mr. Aitken, who mastered one situation at a time, bringing various individuals and combinations together at psychological times, and eliminating undesirables.

Mr. H. E. Aitken.

Mr. Aitken is a representative type of progress. The possibilities of the film industry attracted his attention and he became interested in it, giving it careful study. He began his activities by securing control of the exchange business in Milwaukee, and, spreading out, he added St. Louis to his banner, following it with Joplin, Mo.—a large office, which was afterward moved to Kansas City.

Firmly intrenched in the West, Mr. Aitken came to New York, where he met with furious opposition, but he slowly and steadily removed the barriers, and his foothold increased until he was in control of five exchanges in this city.

In the manufacturing field he took over the Reliance company, and then the Majestic company. Determined opposition to Mr. Aitken in the Motion Picture Distributing & Sales Company finally caused the dissolution of that company.

During this time Mr. Aitken's activities had attracted the attention of Eastern and Western capitalists who had invested their money in his various enterprises, and who were pleased with the returns made. (It is a fact that every project Mr. Aitkin has launched has proved financially successful.) These capitalists joined with Mr. Aitken in the formation of the Mutual Film Corporation, and accepted the stock subscriptions of wealthy men, including prominent Wall Street men and bankers of international reputation, the roster of the stockholders in the Mutual Film Corporation—which has fifty agencies in the United States and Canada—presenting names of power and prominence and forming formidable bulwarks of strength and conservatism. The tremendous success of the Mutual Film Corporation has won the confidence of these gentlemen, who are ready to support any further projects which Mr. Aitken may launch.

Mr. Aitken's ideas and policies have been so clearly proven sound and correct that some of his most bitter opponents when he first came to New York are now his staunch supporters and associates. He is not only one of the largest stockholders in the Mutual Film Corporation, but is largely interested in the Majestic, Reliance and New York Motion Picture Companies.

For the benefit of the trade it can be stated that the various rumors circulated about the Kay-Bee, Broncho and Keystone brands of film by antagonistic parties are without foundation, as these brands will be marketed exclusively through the Mutual Film Corporation for a long term of years.

THE ENGLISH SITUATION.

In view of the many conflicting rumors coming from across the water as to the boycott of American films, this analysis of the situation by one of the foremost figures in the London market will interest and perhaps make clear just what foundation there is for the reports.

"The whole trouble started," writes this correspondent, "when a few weeks ago Pathe Freres decided to only let their films out on hire and discontinue supplying any of the film exchanges. This might have been all right had they not fixed the price so low. This works out at about $3.75 a thousand feet for first run stuff, two changes a week. On the face of it, it seemed to be a move on the part of Pathe Freres to squeeze not only the other manufacturers but also the renters (Exchanges).

"In offering their films on the above conditions, they do not stipulate that the exhibitor must take all Pathe stuff. He can take as much or as little as he pleases. But on this basis of price they will sign for 90 days, only, and will give no hint as to what will happen after that three months period.

"The exhibitors, renters, and other film manufacturers and manufacturers' agents got together in the matter with a view of really boycotting Pathe to the extent of insisting that an exhibitor must take all Pathe or none.

"Negotiations continued along these lines for some days when it occurred to some of the exhibitors that perhaps Pathe's move might help them in the long run by keeping prices down or perhaps lowering them. Under any circumstances they withdrew from the council of the other two groups and refused to have anything to do with the proposed agreement.

"They managed to get a lot of articles published in the daily press as well as the trade papers, and gave as their views that the other two trade groups were trying to form some sort of monopoly and that probably this monopoly really originated in the States, and the intention was to cut off prices and make life miserable for the exhibitor generally.

"By no means are the exhibitors, as a body, in accord with the attitude of the Exhibitors' Association, which, after all is a weak body, which has been in existence for a short time and which anyone can join by paying one shilling a quarter.

"This is the way matters stand to-day and we are going on in the future the same as we have in the past. My personal opinion is that no firm stand is likely to be taken to counteract the Pathe movement, for the simple reason that there are so many small and weak people both exhibitors and in the manufacturers' end who cannot be brought to the point when there is fighting to be done or a strong stand to be taken."

HERE'S A PRESERVATIVE FOR BRIDAL BOUQUETS.

That brides will be enabled to keep their bridal bouquets as long as they desire, as the result from a recent discovery, was the announcement which was made yesterday. Heretofore the bride was unable to keep the nosegay which she cherished so highly, more than three or four days. Now she may keep the violets, lilies of the valley, sweet peas and other beautiful flowers in their natural color and shape. In the past, wax has been used, but the flower lost its color and was encased. It is a known fact that brides traveling in Europe often sent their bouquets to be dipped in the waters at Carlsbad, but they became hard and turned gray. Miss Frances Mason, Miss Dolores Cassinelli and Bryant Washburn, of the Essanay Film Manufacturing Company, have been experimenting the past few weeks, trying to discover a preservative for flowers that will not change the color or beauty. Their pains were not for naught, as their sleepless nights and "brain-storms" have produced for them a remarkable process by which all flowers can be preserved.

"Into the North" (Essanay)

Reviewed by James S. McQuade.

THERE is a breeze from the far Northland—one that smacks of the flavor of the Sinclair stories—in Essanay's latest two-reel feature, "Into the North," that will be released in about three or four weeks. Theodore W. Wharton, who is responsible for the production, has been successful in preserving the proper atmosphere throughout, and the story never lags in interest. It occurs to me that if the far Northwest were more exploited, and the far West less, by producers generally, in the future, much of the monotony now so observable in the film product of this country would be pleasingly relieved. The splendid types of men who preserve order, or force a livelihood, among the Northland's stunted forests and snowy wastes afford fine opportunities for strong characterizations and gripping stories.

The ingenuity of the liquor smugglers who ply their lawless trade across the border is well illustrated in this film subject. The eyes of the sharpest officer of the Northwest Mounted Police would be likely to overlook the concealment of contraband goods in the odds and ends of ordinary firewood, although the carting of such material might excite suspicion. The fearful struggle for life in the snowy wilderness, when the odds are all against a man, is also realistically shown in these films. That struggle between the officer and the smuggler, in the lone cabin, with the frightened Indian girl as the only witness, is a thrilling scene. It is a pitting of the skill and brawn of strong men for the mastery, without recourse to weapons, although the criminal attempted the latter. In the end, the death of the escaped murderer at the hands of the officers of the law is a fitting and dramatic climax.

The two principal characters—Fred Wentworth, of the N. W. M. P., and Frank Davis, whiskey runner and murderer—are ably taken by E. H. Calvert and William Bailey, respectively. The old Indian and his squaw are admirably drawn by Frank Dayton and Mrs. Clara Smith, and Miss Dorothy Phillips acts the part of the Indian girl very well, indeed. There is a strong characterization of the chief of the mounted police, and Mr. Holuber's impersonation of the bank president is satisfying.

The story opens in a bank in Minneapolis. Fred Wentworth, one of the clerks, is sent out on a message, and while he is gone the cashier is shot dead by Frank Davis, a robber and bad man generally. Davis secures a package of bank notes and hurriedly departs. On his way to the street he runs into Fred Wentworth (who is returning to the bank) with such force that he drops the package. He recognizes Wentworth and, fearful of arrest, rushes away and catches a northbound train that is just pulling out.

Wentworth stops amazed and lifts the package. Entering the bank, he discovers the dead cashier and a revolver on the floor. Horrified, he lifts the revolver, and while holding it and the package of bills in his hands the president of the bank enters. The proofs of murder are so clear that Wentworth is sentenced to life imprisonment in the penitentiary.

Frank Davis, in the meantime, has gone to one of his old haunts in the North, near the boundary line. He induces one of his former associates to join him in whiskey-running across the border. While the men are engaged in this outlawry, Fred Wentworth escapes from prison and heads for the Northwest. He is saved from death in the snowdrifts by an officer of the mounted police, who carries him to headquarters. After his recovery he applies to the chief for admission to the force, and is accepted as a member.

The president of the Minneapolis bank, a brother of the chief of the N. W. M. P., chances to arrive at the post on a visit about the time that Wentworth is about to leave on a search for the whiskey smugglers. The president catches a side glimpse of Wentworth's face as he rides off, and tries to recall it. He fails, but it still haunts him, and the truth flashes on him some time after Wentworth's departure. He immediately denounces Wentworth as an escaped murderer, and the chief despatches two of his men to arrest that officer.
